Married Persons Dominate The Work Force, According To Survey

WASHINGTON — Married persons continue to dominate the work force, but their share has been declining steadily, the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the U.S. Department of Labor reported.

From March, 1970 to March, 1980, the proportion of the labor force composed of married persons living with their spouses fell from 69 to 61 per cent, while the share composed of never-married and divorced persons rose from 24 to 33 per cent.

The gradual transformation of the marital composition of the labor force reflects major demographic and social changes that have occurred during the 1970's. For example, half of the more than twenty million increase in the labor force during the decade was among persons 25-34 years old, who now account for more than one of every four workers. Many of these workers, born during the post-World War II "baby boom", tended either to postpone marriage or not to marry. Those who did marry were more than twice as likely to become divorced than were workers of a similar age ten years ago. The result is that only 65 per cent of workers 25-34 years old were married in March, 1980, down from 79 per cent a decade earlier.

This overview of the 1970's is based on data obtained each March as part of the Current Population Survey. Other relevant findings from the survey:

- The number of married women in the labor force has soared by nearly six million over the 1970's. By March, 1980, 24.4 million wives were working or looking for work.

- About 17.5 million or 56.6 per cent of all women with children under eighteen were in the labor force in March, 1980. Although mothers of school-age children are more likely to be in the work force than those with children under six, the number of working mothers with preschool children also has been rising dramatically.

- One of every five mothers in the labor force, or a total of 3.8 million, was maintaining her own family. Mothers in one-parent families had a much higher labor force participation rate (67 per cent) than those in two-parent families (54 per cent). Even when children under six were present, 55 per cent of the mothers maintaining their own families were in the labor force, compared with 45 per cent of wives with children under six.

- In March, 1980, 30.7 million children under eighteen, or 53 per cent of the total, had mothers in the labor force. This compares with 25.5 million, or 39 per cent, who had working mothers in 1970. By March, 1980, 43 per cent of all youngsters below age six had mothers in the labor force, compared with 29 per cent at the outset of the 1970's.

couple families in 1979 ($21,600) surpassed that of families maintained by a male householder ($16,600) and was more than twice as high as that for families maintained by a female householder ($9,800). The higher median income of married-couple families is due, in large part, to the presence of more than one earner. More than sixty per cent of the married-couple families had two or more earners — usually the husband and wife. Only 43 per cent of families maintained by men and 28 per cent of those maintained by women were multi-earner families.

- Over the past few years, the labor force participation rate of white wives has been rising faster than for black wives; thus, the gap between their rates has narrowed somewhat. In March, 1980, the rate for white wives was 49.4 per cent, compared with 58.9 per cent for black wives and 46.0 per cent for Hispanic wives.
