Life without a heartbeat is now possible, thanks to a new type of blood pump developed by an Austrian scientist.

Professor Johann Navratil has been conducting research in Vienna on the problems of the "artificial heart," for the past 12 years. He recently disclosed his development of a pump which can serve as at least a temporary substitute for the heart.

An Austrian scientist has developed a new type of blood pump which performs normal functions of the heart.

After a heart failure, medication often is not able to restart the heart. Professor Navratil's mechanical pump can maintain blood circulation, enabling the heart to rest and heal completely.

So far, the device has been used successfully only in experiments with calves. The laboratory animals have lived for up to eight weeks
