

Red Cross Honors Dr. Charles R. Drew

By Donald Marable
Charles Richard Drew (1904-1950), physician, scholar, scientist, surgeon, star athlete and pioneer of blood plasma preservation was honored June 1-5 by the American Red Cross in a series of programs during "Drew Week".

The honor services began with the presentation of a portrait of Dr. Drew to the Durham Red Cross facility by Dr. H.E. Haggler, pastor of St. Mark AME Zion Church. The programs for Drew Week were organized by Doug Gibson, assistant director of Blood Service; Mrs. Edith M. King, Dr. Charles D. Watts, a personal friend and student of the late Dr. Drew; and Dr. Charles W. Orr, national chairman of the Red Cross.

Dr. Watts went to Washington, D.C. on June 3 to unveil a 35¢ stamp in honor of Charles Drew.

Drew was born in Washington, D.C., on June 3, 1904. He graduated from Amherst College in Massachusetts in 1926 as an outstanding scholar, baseball and track athlete. He was awarded the Howard Hill Mossman Trophy for the athlete who contributed the most to Amherst athletics.

Drew coached basketball and football at Morgan College in Baltimore, Md., before he decided to become a doctor. Within a few years, he had saved enough to enter McGill Medical College, Montreal, Quebec, Canada. Drew achieved an outstanding scholastic record, was elected to Alpha Omega Alpha, a medical honorary fraternity, and, at the close of his senior year, was awarded the Williams Prize that is presented annually to the top five men in the class.

Drew received his M.D. degree from McGill in 1933 and two years later joined the faculty of Howard University Medical School in Washington, D.C., teaching pathology and surgery. Howard's Dean Adams regarded Drew as one of the brightest young men there and Drew was awarded a General Education Board Fellowship to Columbia University Medical School. His research at Columbia in the area of blood preservation and its use for transfusion purposes often occupied as many as eighteen hours a day. Drew gathered mass scientific data that led to a publication entitled, Banked Blood: A Study in Blood Preservation in 1940 that outlined an efficient method of storing large quantities of blood plasma in "blood banks". He earned a Doctor of Science degree from Columbia. Prior to Drew's work, there had been no way to store large quantities of blood for transfusions.

At the outbreak of World War II, it is reported that Drew received an urgent cable from Dr. John Beattie, director of the research laboratories of the Royal College of Surgeons, requesting 5,000 ampules of dried plasma. Nowhere in the entire world could such amount of dried blood be procured. However, heading a "Blood for Britain" project, Drew procured enough blood to save the lives of thousands of soldiers at the height of the Nazi German blitzkrieg of England in September, 1940.

The following year, Dr. Drew was selected as the director of the American Red Cross Blood Bank and as assistant director of blood procurement for the National Research Council. This was during the time that the Red Cross itself would not accept a donation of blood from Drew because he was a Negro. With continued protests of the humiliating practice of separating Negro and white blood, the Red Cross changed its ruling.

Drew resigned his position at the Red Cross. He returned to a professorship in surgery at Howard Medical School — with a Spingarn Medal — to become chief of staff at Freedmen's Hospital. Dr. Drew was later named vice president of the American-Soviet Medical Society. He received honorary degrees of Doctor of Science from Virginia State College and Amherst.

Dr. Drew continued his research, even as he headed Freedmen's Hospital, until an untimely car accident claimed his life near Burlington, North Carolina on April 1, 1950. Popular reports of the time record that Dr. Drew, the pioneer of blood plasma preservation, was refused admission to an Alamance County hospital because he was a Negro. Dr. Charles Watts, in an interview at his Durham office this week, refuted those reports as a "misconception". Dr. Watts said there were three physicians in the car at the time of the accident. They were all injured; three were treated; Dr. Drew's case was critical and he died at the hospital in the process of being transported to Duke Hospital in Durham.

Coping

The Astounding Technique Of Persuasion. Part V

By Dr. Charles W. Faulkner

In the preceding four columns, I presented you with suggestions that you could follow to develop a magnetic personality and make people like you. Following is additional advice:

1. Learn, learn, learn. Obtain as much knowledge in as many areas of endeavor as you can. Learn about everything that you can imagine. It is not necessary for you to go to school to increase your knowledge. You can go to your library, read books and magazines that your friends own, talk with acquaintances about important issues — as well as unimportant but interesting issues. Listen to the radio and to lectures and discussions that others participate in. Stay in the company of knowledgeable people.

If you can, take a course. Learn about government, philosophy, psychology, English, grammar, culture, sports, medicine — anything. The more knowledge that you have, the more capable you will be of talking intelligently about many, many subjects. People respect an intelligent, knowledgeable person and are likely to listen intently to anything that you have to say.

2. Believe in yourself. Feel superior and compassionate. Stick your chest out. Hold your head up. Always give the image of strength and confidence.

3. Dress neatly — always. Never be seen by others in unkempt attire. You need not dress in expensive clothes, but you should always be neat.

4. Remember that you will be judged by your appearance, your speech and your behavior. People need not know what you really think — if you are compassionate, confident and under cool control.

5. Believe in yourself. Never stop dreaming about your future success.

6. Strongly desire to succeed.

7. Become excited about your life. Be enthusiastic about your life. Liven yourself up emotionally — in spite of problems.

8. Evaluate yourself fairly and accurately. You are a capable, talented person. Be sure that you realize it and others will also.

9. Never try to win an argument — you will only lose friends.

10. Praise the other party enthusiastically. They will like being in your company because you make them feel good.

11. Always control your temper — be cool and calm regardless of the situation.

12. Be positive about everything that you do and think. Never let gloom descend upon you.

13. Learn, baby, learn. Improve your mind and your knowledge about yourself, other people and the world you live in.

In order to persuade other people to follow you, they must like you. When you provide them with praise and avoid offending people, they will get a warm feeling of joy whenever they see you — whenever they think about you.

When you think about the people whom you admire, you will notice that they are always under control, they give the impression of being knowledgeable about issues, they do not constantly complain about problems, and they do not verbally abuse others or yourself. You admire them because they are agreeable and allow you to have your moment in the sun. They are compassionate and consistent in their behavior. They like you, so you like them.

If you really want to win friends, make people like you and motivate them happily to follow your advice, you should copy the behavior of the person whom you admire.

heart of the Middle East conflict. In many ways, I think that we who are descendants of Jews and Arabs miss the point of the concept of "The Chosen People." As with Christians, many Jews and Moslems believe that whoever owns Jerusalem and the land there around will be the people to realize the "land of milk and honey." I do not profess to know what is God's plan, but I think they are wrong. Those who are designated or joined "The Chosen People," may not have been singled out for special favors, only to serve God and help mankind realize His mission of peace, brotherhood and love.

Black People, our course can be that of peace, brotherhood and love, but first we must start with self and get our act together.
