WILLIAM FLORVILLE

William Florville was broke and hungry when he arrived in New Salem, Ill., in 1831. He was on his way to Springfield, and without the help of the town storekeeper he might never have gotten there.

Florville was a barber by trade and his tall, lanky, new-found friend took him over to the Rutledge Tavern and lined him up some customers. After a couple of shaves and haircuts, Florville had enough money to continue his journey.

Six years later, the two men met again in Springfield. Florville then was the owner of the only barbershop in town.

His New Salem friend had just been admitted to the bar, and had come to Springfield to hang out his shingle: Abraham Lincoln, Attorney at Law.

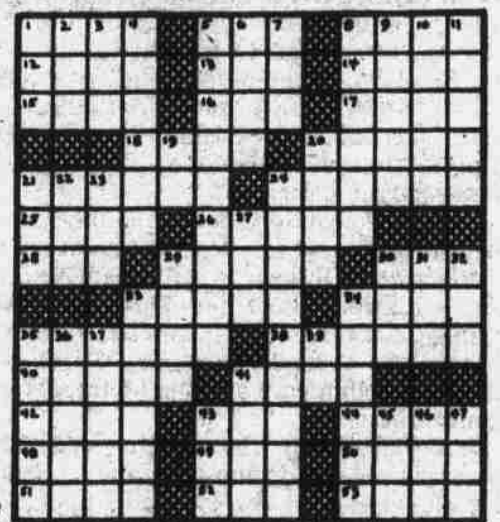

Florville died at the age of 62, three years after the death of Lincoln. Many of Springfield's most distinguished citizens attended the funeral. The Daily Illinois State Journal noted in an obituary that Florville was "an honest, conscientious man who won the respect of all that knew him."
