Niger Gets $13.6 Million Grant For Rural Development Project

WASHINGTON, DC

The Agency for International Development is providing the Republic of Niger with $13.6 million to help it achieve food self-sufficiency and improve the standards of living for its rural poor in the Niamey region.

"Over 75% of this amount will be disbursed in the U.S. for the procurement of U.S. technical services, vehicles, fertilizer and miscellaneous supplies," said AID administrator Peter McPherson.

The grant is part of a $21.3 million joint U.S.-Niger five year effort.

The project is designed to firmly establish an extension system which will permit 6,000 farmers to receive the agricultural inputs and training needed for the adoption of improved cultivation practices. Adoption of the improved practices will greatly increase the crop yields. Other beneficiaries will be the 8,000 villagers who will participate in the training programs for literacy, cooperatives, blacksmithing, on-farm cattle fattening, and forestry. Also, nearly 60,000 other farm families (420,000 people) living in the project area will benefit indirectly from the spread-effect of the innovations introduced. All beneficiaries are members of Niger's vast rural poor majority who have an average per capita cash income of less than $30 per year.

Environment damage caused by drought and growing population pressures continues to plague West Africa's Sahel region. Niger, which has a population of 5.6 million and is twice the size of Texas, is one of eight Sahelian countries that suffers from cyclical drought and consequent food shortage problems. The other countries are: Cape Verde, Chad, The Gambia, Mauritania, Mali, Senegal and Upper Volta. AID is supporting projects designed to alleviate these problems in all of these countries.
