Career Women Becoming Important
By JAN CHRISTENSEN
N. C. State University

Advertising agencies have caught on to a new fact of life — these days there are more women working outside the home than there are full-time homemakers. So advertisers have started to court these female consumers who make more than 60 percent of the vacation decisions, choose 50 percent of the television sets and account for 30 percent of all new car sales, notes Dr. Justine Rozier, extension family resource management specialist, North Carolina State University. Ads show career women buying airline tickets, thinking about insurance or wanting to know more about the stock market. There's also greater emphasis on family togetherness. Now commercials show husbands cooking dinner, taking care of the children or helping around the house. Working women are becoming important financially, whether their earnings go for independent living or are used to boost the family kitty. And the advertisers have realized it.
