More Political Involvement Urged During Panel Of Governors At A&T

GREENSBORO — Predictions of the need for more grassroots political involvement, continued growth of tourism in the state and the need to consider more metro governments and mergers were among the many topics broached during a one-hour panel discussion by Governor Jim Hunt and three former governors at A&T State University recently.

"We have got to consider more concepts of metro government and merger," said former Republican governor, Jim Holshouser. "There are just too many people doing the same things and living across the street from each other."

The need for improved communications among the citizens and state government was also pointed out in the panel, moderated by President William Friday, chairman of the Hunt Commission on the Future of North Carolina.

"We have got to devise a means so people can speak more directly to the issues," said Hunt. "Television has really become a significant force," said former Governor Dan Moore.

"I ran the last homegrown campaign." "Those who seek public office," said former Governor Bob Scott, "need to try harder to be more realistic in perceiving the needs of the state and in communicating those needs to the people."

Hunt urged an expansion of the tourism industry in the state and in the improvement of educational and health care opportunities for the citizens.

"Tourism is the state's third largest industry and we expect a growth of 12 per cent by the turn of the century. "It's a $7 billion industry we have to continue to provide attractive sites and roads."
