Program Teaches Children To Reduce Aggressive Behavior

A pilot program to reduce the aggressive and disruptive behavior of 80 Durham County school children was so successful that it will be expanded next year, says its initiator, Dr. John Lochman of the Duke University Medical Center.

Lochman, a psychologist, teamed with Dr. Peter Burch, a guidance counselor at the Hillandale Elementary School, to form "anger-coping groups" of five boys, each led by the school's guidance counselor and personnel from Duke's division of child and adolescent psychiatry.

"After 12 group sessions, 60 per cent of the students showed moderate improvement in reducing aggressive behaviors," said Lochman. Improvement was measured by questionnaires filled out by the boys, their parents and teachers before and after participating in the anger-coping program.

"The results look very promising," said Burch, who has been a guidance counselor at the Durham elementary school for seven years. "Basically we're dealing with a part of the population that no one knows how to handle effectively. These children fight a great deal with each other and talk back to their teachers."

Lochman said the counseling groups included fourth, fifth and sixth graders from eight different county schools. Groups met once a week for about 45 minutes to an hour. The goal was to teach the boys, selected for the program because they frequently disrupted classes with aggressive behavior, to think before acting.

"Research shows that aggressive children tend to act reflexively rather than thinking through the alternatives," Lochman said. "We put a lot of effort into teaching the children to think about different solutions, whether aggressive or not, and then to consider the consequences."

This emphasis on problem-solving skills is what makes the Duke pilot program unusual among behavioral training programs for aggressive children, Lochman said. Such programs as the Duke psychologist's anger-coping groups are not widely used in this country, he said.

Pre-adolescent aggressive youths tend to act out verbally, Lochman said, but begin to express their anger more physically and violently as they grow older.

"I'm convinced that if we intervene early enough we can make changes that can help prevent some of these children from ending up in trouble later," he said. "And the school system also is concerned with training these children so they won't disrupt classes."

Lochman said he and the counselors considered a session a success if they were able to convince a child to think about at least one other alternative to aggressive behavior.

"The group process is all a part of helping each child understand his own impulsive set of aggressive behavior so he can learn how to cope," Lochman said.

The counselors used video tapes to demonstrate aggressive reactions by other children and nonaggressive ways to handle each situation.

In one anger-coping session, one aggressive fifth grader stood in the middle of a circle while all of the other boys in the group repeatedly taunted him.

"When he got angry and started stomping what we called the 'angry

Reynolds Extends Scholarships

BALTIMORE — A scholarship program to support journalism education for black youths has been extended to twenty additional students over the next seven years by the program's sponsor, R.J. Reynolds Industries, Inc.

The R.J. Reynolds Scholarship Program in Journalism began in 1972 with a commitment to support 20 students and was extended to an additional 20 in 1977. With the expansion announced here, the corporation's commitment to the program now exceeds $200,000, supporting 60 students.

In announcing expansion of the program, Reynolds Industries vice president Marshall B. Bass told members of the National Newspaper Publishers Association (NNPA), "we believe this program is making a significant contribution to the needs of black journalists and is preparing them to move into the mainstream of U.S. journalism."

"Graduates of the program are doing well and the students currently in training are representative of the high standards set by the NNPA," Bass said. Seventeen students have graduated and sixteen are currently in training, he reported. The NNPA Scholarship Foundation selects students for participation in the program. "We believe this program is making progress in closing the gap between the needs of publishers and the number of black journalists available," Bass said. "Our renewal of support is based on the effectiveness of the program so far, and a sign of our faith in its continued success."

R.J. Reynolds Industries, with headquarters in Winston-Salem, is the parent company of R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.; Del Monte Corp.; R.J. Reynolds Tobacco International, Inc.; Aminoil USA, Inc.; Sea-Land Industries Investments, Inc.
