A WELCOME MAT FOR DISEASE

Allan R. Magie, Ph.D., M.P.H.

Legionnaire's disease. Toxic shock syndrome. Fort Bragg fever. Infant botulism. New diseases, old diseases with new faces, or both?

These, along with a number of other newly labeled diseases, have suddenly burst on us.

They all seem to have one thing in common—they have taken advantage of the way we live and of the changes man makes in his environment.

A look at history provides us with some clear illustrations of this phenomenon. The black plague of the Middle Ages resulted from the close relationship between man and the domesticated rat. The rodents depended on man for shelter, food, and water—which were unwittingly provided—and fleas from sickened rats made the short jump onto the nearest warm body.

Even today Chagas' disease in the Americas—an incurable condition—reaches man through an insect that thrives in human dwellings, sucking blood from the inhabitants and living in cracks and dark recesses. Urban yellow fever and other mosquito-carried problems continue because we surround ourselves with water-holding plants, ponds, and cast-off containers like automobile tires and tin cans.

Unfortunately man's lifestyle and the modern conveniences he enjoys have continued this sad legacy. Let's look at a few examples.

Mothers, in an effort to use a healthier sweetener for baby's cereal, choose honey over granulated sugar. The heat-resistant spores of the botulism organism find a favorable home in the baby's intestinal tract. Multiplying there, they produce the deadly toxin which blocks the breathing process. A significant number of so-called "crib deaths" have been the result of botulism.

Legionnaire's disease, Fort Bragg fever, and several other pneumonia-like infections result from humans breathing air pulled through cooling towers in which microorganisms thrive.

Women using tampons have unknowingly provided another home for staph bacteria, which produce a tissue-destroying toxin sometimes resulting in death.

All of these new diseases have forced us to think about our role in spreading disease. We must become more conscious about the consequences of the change we make in our environment. It is inevitable that bacteria and viruses will change form and continually affect us differently, but it is our responsibility to avoid making changes that might hasten this natural process.
