Meanwhile, the aides association plans shortly to elect permanent officers and to adopt a constitution as well as recruit members. Mrs. Monroe, coordinator of the association's organizing process, declined to give specific figures on current membership, until November 1, after the association elects officers.

Bridges reports 20 aides have so far paid partial or full membership dues for NCAE membership. The paid up deadline is December 9.

Mrs. Monroe said through the aides association they hope to promote professional growth of paraprofessionals by encouraging them to seek further training, to urge active participation in helping to solve school problems and to commit themselves to a professional code of ethics.

She said the association is trying to negotiate carefully with school officials, DCAE officials as well as state representatives to gather firm support and to avoid the mistakes of the past.

"We don't see where it's going to take anything from the teachers," said Bridges. "If everyone is under the same umbrella, then they will want the same thing and no one will have anything to complain about."
