"I don't understand why the problems between the United States of America and Angola should be causing this delay, since the United States has told us the two issues are not linked." Chissano also said that his talks with Shultz had opened the way for "much better" relations between Mozambique and the U.S. This will enable the two governments to discuss the Namibian issue productively, he added.

The pressure on the administration has also come from Capitol Hill in the form of a letter of concern about Namibia from the 30-member conservative Republican Steering Group in the Senate. One of a series of foreign policy pronouncements by the group, which are sent to senior officials marked "secret", the letter expressed concern about the future of the Angolan dissident movement UNITA should the U.S. reach an agreement with Angola and recognize the Marxist government there.

The letter also took issue with reported statements by administration officials expressing optimism about a Namibian settlement when it has been unable to deliver.

interest in home economics must continue to offer solutions for problems facing this nation, Dr. Elizabeth D. Koontz told the audience attending a one-day workshop entitled, "Scholastic Excellence and Shared Leadership," at North Carolina Central University.

Dr. Koontz, former director of the Women's Bureau of the U.S. Department of Labor and president of the National Education Association in 1968, was the featured speaker at a seminar for high school students sponsored by the Home Economics Department at North Carolina Central University, and Kappa Omicron Phi, the national home economics honor society.

Community resources are important. They have been cut," Dr. Koontz said. "I predict that this (the Reagan) administration, like all other administrations, will attempt in the next year to put a seal on some new programs that will do most of the things these old programs did, but we will hurt by the time it gets done."

Home economics was one program that suffered major cuts due to an image of "stirring and stitching," Dr. Koontz said. Although the image of home economics has started to change, Dr. Koontz explained that home economics still has not achieved an image as a leader in modern appliances and technology.

Home economics offers solutions to problems that we are all concerned with, Dr. Koontz said, including eating, fashion, the environment, and health hazards. She emphasized that people who have a specialty in finding or offering solutions must become political to get these solutions accepted.

This year, Central has about 5,000 students, many of whom are college transfers, as well as quite a number of foreign students.

"Over the past five or six years, more students have been transferring from the community colleges in their home towns to four year schools," said Mrs. Nancy Rowland, Central's director of undergraduate admissions. "I am sure that the economic situation is the reason for this."

In her closing remarks, Dr. Koontz asked the students to accept some of the responsibility for improving society through contributions to home economics.

"So why don't you accept a responsibility for improving this society of which you are a part, and will be a part, by looking seriously at the whole arena of economics which is much more than home economics, and decide this is where you will make your contribution, not only to your race, not only to your people, but to people wherever you live, because it's transferable from one continent to another."
