Block Grant

neath centers. As for the money, the new fiscal year — 1982-83 — began October 1, but even now state government officials are not sure what the federal block grant allocation will finally be. State officials have been told to spend at the 1981-82 level.

For the past fiscal year, the state got about $200 million in block grant money, assigned to three departments and eight programs.

The departments are: Human Resources, Natural Resources and Public Instruction. The programs include preventive health, maternal and child health, social services, as well as programs to enhance mental health and curtail alcoholism and drug abuse.

What all this means, according to state officials, is that everyone is still guessing just how the block grant program will finally affect recipients of these services: agencies and departments which administer the programs, and local economies to make up for whatever cuts should occur in federal funding.

So it appears that the block grant program in North Carolina boils down to, as one state official characterized it, "a super idea, but not nearly enough money to do what's needed."

In North Carolina, people need everything from help with energy bills during the winter months to economic development for the state's smaller cities.

Despite federal cuts ranging from 18 per cent in some programs to about 35 per cent in others, the federal block grants are tagged to fill those needs.

For example, during the last fiscal year, which ended September 30, the N.C. Department of Human Resources got $116 million for five block grants. These programs included preventive health, maternal and child health, low income energy, social services and alcohol/drug abuse and mental health efforts.

In the N.C. Department of Natural Resources, two block grants — community services and small cities — brought $55 million. The State Department of Public Instruction got an education block grant of about $11 million.

But as Gov. Hunt illustrated in a recent example, it still wasn't enough, because when the small cities program was announced, requests totaling more than $157 million came in, while there was only $45 million for the grant.

And about 250,000 households received fuel assistance payments, a one-time check averaging $148 per household, but funds were available for only about half of those needing assistance. According to state budget literature tighter eligibility requirements were used to weed out the needy. But with the new flexibility in the fuel assistance program, the state can decide whether to send checks directly to customers as they do now or to suppliers. And, in the social service grant, states unlike before, can shift spending emphasis according to local needs.

So now if more money is needed in child care than in preventive health, for example, the state can adjust, in the middle of the budget year for that matter, and shift funds to the place of urgency.

State officials say, however, that the grants arrived with more restrictions than they first thought. Program participants have felt the pinch in terms of eligibility requirements.

Consider: The Fed's restricted use of the low income energy assistance grants to no more than 10 per cent for administrative cost and up to 15 per cent for weatherization. That brought on tighter eligibility requirements. To qualify, a family of

Fiscal Controller Named

GREENSBORO — Dr. Romeo D. Brion, a veteran educational fiscal manager, has been named comptroller and assistant vice chancellor for fiscal affairs at A&T State University.

The appointment, announced by Chancellor Edward B. Fort, completes the circuit of new positions requested and filled by Fort since his arrival at A&T 14 months ago to enhance the university's fiscal operations.

"Dr. Romeo Brion is an extraordinarily effective and committed administrator," said Fort. "Not only are his credentials impeccable, but he also has labored in the vineyard of education for many years. He knows the intricacies of fiscal management, can accommodate the computer science ramifications of high technology and he embodies the essence of what I am seeking as a member of this administrative team."

Brion comes to A&T after serving as a corporate taxation specialist and management consultant for the RB Management Corporation in Las Vegas.

He was formerly treasurer and chief business officer for the Philippine Union College in the Philippines and served at one time as chief business administrator of the In-keeper, Michigan School District. Brion was also assistant for business for the Davis Joint Unified School District at Davis, Calif. Brion holds the bachelor's degree in accountancy.
