

N.C. 2000: The Future

just don't know how you get more blacks involved. I've tried to encourage people to come to the meetings. I've tried to make sure that they're informed of what's going on. But in the final analysis, people must want to be involved. They must want to change their lives, rather than waiting for someone else to change them."

The question, though, is involvement in what?

The N.C. 2000 project started June 1, 1981, when Gov. Jim Hunt signed an executive order that among other things established the following:

* The Commission on the Future of North Carolina, composed of members of the State Goals and Policy Board, five members each from the Senate and House of Representatives and citizens. Commission members are appointed by the governor.

* That the Department of Administration provide staff and budgetary support for the N.C. 2000 project.

* That the state boards, commissions and other similar bodies established under North Carolina's laws...assist the Commission in...[its work].

The basic work of the Commission is described in six areas. They are:

* To carry out a futures program to be known as North Carolina 2000.

* To build an awareness of and concern for North Carolina's future among citizens of this state.

* To identify the future opportunities and constraints which may affect the quality of life for North Carolinians by the year 2000.

* To develop alternatives for achieving the best possible future for North Carolina.

* To offer citizens the opportunity to voice their views, suggestions and ideas on future alternatives.

* To prepare and present recommendations to the Governor and General Assembly for public and private actions which would enhance North Carolina's future.

To carry out this work, Commission members, about twelve of whom are black, first asked County Commissions in each of the state's 100 counties to appoint county chairmen to convene meetings designed to get local input into the process. There are 68 members of the Commission and, according to Commission Member Carolyn Coleman, regional director of the NAACP, all of the county chairmen are white.

In addition, the Commission developed a questionnaire that was later published free of charge in many of the state's newspapers, seeking additional citizen input on North Carolina's future.

According to Bill Friday, more than 113,000 North Carolinians answered and returned the questionnaires. In addition, Friday explained, the state budget office conducted a phone survey to get even more information.

"As the information came in," said Ms. Nancy Davis, a Commission member and elementary school principal in Charlotte, "we were surprised to find out how similar the views were. In almost every instance, commission members, persons meeting on the county level, people who returned questionnaires and people who responded to the phone survey identified the same concerns, the same problems and the same opportunities."

Overall, the problems and opportunities fell into the following categories:

* On the subject of North

Carolina's People, the major areas of concern were safe working environments, healthy lifestyles, adequate health care, adequate safe, sanitary and decent housing, appropriate academic and career based education and the reduction of poverty.

* On the subject of the state's Community, the major concerns centered around protecting the man-made environment, insuring that new developments enhance the community, encouraging more cultural and recreational activities, and to enhance secure communities by improving the ability to prevent crime.

* On the subject of the state's Economy, the major concerns were how to maintain a favorable business climate in the state, how to improve capital access, especially for small business, industry and agriculture, to encourage and support new technological development, to improve the capacity of training institutions to retrain and upgrade the workforce, among other concerns.

* On the subject of Natural Resources, major concerns boiled down to how to protect the environment, guard health against the effects of industrial toxic wastes and insure adequate public water and wastewater systems.

An finally, after two days of discussing, debating and haggling over major and minor issues, the Raleigh conference boiled down to "where do we go from here?"

No one knew for sure, but there were quite a number of ideas.

Said one participant: "We should have a regular process of monitoring and updating the final report so we can be sure this work isn't in vain."

Hunt said: "It is my hope that every candidate for public office, from the governor on down to the county commissions and city councils, will make the work of this group, the suggestions of the final report, a part of their political agenda."

But Mrs. Edna Davis of Raleigh added the final analysis when she said: "The people have asked the questions, tried to find the answers and done all this work. Then if nothing happens with the report, it will be mostly the fault of the people."

Writer Calls Cost Shift 'Daft'

A Chicago-based writer recently criticized the Federal government for paying hospitals less than a fair share for Medicare patients.

"Hospitals have responded (to reductions in Federal monies) by what is called cost shifting," said Chicago Tribune reporter Jon

Van. That is, they charge their paying patients, mostly the insured private patients, more to make up for the money they now lose on the Federal patients.

A "Daft idea" "This is daft," he continued. "When you buy a fleet of trucks," if General Motors says it is tacking 30 per cent onto the price to cover the loss it took last month selling scooters to the Post Office, would you go ahead and pay, or would you check to see what Ford or Toyota could offer you?"
