FEED NECESSARY FOR HENS DURING WINTER

Insects and Green Stuff Are Plentiful in Summer.

Provision Must Be Made in Severe Weather for Animal Food and Succulence—Essential for Production of Eggs.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

During the summer months the farmer's flock balances its ration of grain and seeds with bugs, worms, and green stuff, and the farmer need not worry about egg production if his fowls have been well culled. But winter feeding requires that provision be made to replace the deficiency of animal food.

The absence of these essentials to good egg production is responsible in large degree for the falling off in yield during cold weather.

Animal food, or other feeds rich in protein, may be easily supplied on most farms, particularly where skim milk or buttermilk is available. The milking of hens for these dairy by-products is a good indication of the need for what they contain. Meat scrap is another excellent protein feed that has become standard in poultry rations. Clover and alfalfa leaves provide a combination of protein feed and green stuff. Often enough of them may be swept up from the barn floor where the hay is handled. A good way to prepare them for the flock is to pour boiling water over them, cover the container and let them steam for a time, when they will be ready to feed alone or in a mash.

Sprouted oats has become one of the best-known providers of succulence in winter. Plans for making sprouters may be obtained from the United States Department of Agriculture. Mangels and cabbage, as well as many other vegetables, are appreciated by the hens.

In general, winter feeding is much the same as summer feeding. On the government poultry farms the same rations are used in summer and winter. Of course, in summer it is unnecessary to feed succulent feed when the birds have range and are able to get plenty of grass, alfalfa, or similar feed. The farmer's flock, however, is an exception to this rule, as in many cases there is enough waste grain, seeds, etc., in summer to supply much of the feed required.

NOVEL PLAN TO HEAT WATER

Exhaust From Gas Engine Keeps Troughs From Freezing—Idea Shown in Illustration.

On a farm in the southwestern part of Michigan they use the exhaust from the gas engine to keep the water in the stock watering troughs from freezing.

Using Exhaust From Gas Engine to Keep Water in Trough From Freezing.

The exhaust is discharged into an old hot water tank and from there is piped through the wall of the building to a rectangular frame of pipe resting on the bottom of the trough. An elbow over the rim of the tank permits the exhaust to discharge into the air.—Michigan Farmer.

SUPPLY BASE FOR BIRDS

The air forces can be concentrated against the enemies of orchard and garden by setting up a base of supplies for winter birds. This is the suggestion of A. C. Burrell of the Missouri College of Agriculture, who further states that suet trimmings, warmed and mixed with bread crumbs, make an excellent food to attract birds and help them survive the worst storms of winter.

Suet molded into a ball and enclosed in a loosely woven mesh of twine can be hung in a tree so that the English sparrows will not touch it. These suspicious birds fear to alight on a pendant object, but the native winter birds will eat readily from such a supply. They will supplement this food with numberless hibernating insects.

SUNFLOWER GOOD AS SILAGE

Crop Regarded as Successful and Profitable by Many Farmers in Canadian Provinces.

Many Canadian farmers are growing sunflowers for ensilage and the crop is said to be very successful and profitable. This movement was started experimentally a few years ago and proved such a great success that many hundreds of acres were planted last spring and the acreage will be much greater next year. Silos are being erected in large numbers all over Canada for storing the material.
