Betty and Uncle John

By CLARA DELAFIELD
(©, 1922, Western Newspaper Union.)

"I'll cut the scoundrel off with a penny!" Uncle John shouted. "I won't have it, I say! When I'm ready to let Harold get married I'll let him know. Now, it's no use talking to me! Don't let me hear another word upon the subject!"

Uncle John was in one of his rages, and his sister, Letitia, who had interceded on behalf of Harold, her son, withdrew timidly from the scene. For, apart from her own qualms and terror of her brother when he was in one of his rages, the doctor had privately warned her that if his anger were allowed to rage unchecked apoplexy might supervene.

Uncle John was an elderly member of a numerous family, and the only unmarried one. Having succeeded in life, he was called upon to bear a good many financial burdens on behalf of the weaker vessels, which, to his credit it must be said, he did quite cheerfully. And Letitia's son, Harold, was his favorite nephew.

He had sent Harold, a quiet, unassuming fellow, through college. He was really very fond of him. But Uncle John was an autocrat, and when he took an idea into his head nothing could get it out again.

And his rages were terrible, elemental, volcanic, soul-withering. No one on earth dared stand up against Uncle John when he let himself go— which was not infrequently.

His autocratic ways had been growing on him of late. Letty, the next eldest, could remember the time when Uncle John had been a quiet, rather timid boy, bossed by herself and the rest. How strangely he had developed!

Harold wanted to marry Betty Pringle, a very nice girl who was employed in the same office with him. There was nothing whatever against the match, except that Uncle John had put his foot down and sworn he would not permit it.

"It's so—so hard, my dear," said Letty to her sister Barbara. "He's just taken this notion into his head, and of course—well, you know, John. And if Harold and Betty marry, he'll cut him off without a penny. Besides, Harold can't do that immediately, at any rate without letting Uncle John see he's determined. After all, he does owe John a good deal!"

Betty was for defying the old tyrant. "I don't see why you should care, darling," she said to Harold. "It isn't reasonable."

"That's what I told him," answered Harold. "And it came to the point where I had either to fight him or get out. So I—got."

"I'm going to see him," Betty announced; and she stuck to her guns, despite the appeals of the relations that it would only precipitate trouble. The only chance, they said, was to wait until Uncle John came round. Once in a great while he did come round—if he weren't pressed too hard.

Betty, who had not the traditional terror of Uncle John, took her own line of action. There was no difficulty in obtaining admission to Uncle John's house, and the moment she entered his library Betty could see that he was spooling for a fight.

"So you're the whelp of a child that wants to marry my nephew!" Uncle John sneered. "After my money, I suppose." He thumped his great fist on the desk. "Listen to me! The day my nephew marries you I cut him off—for ever. Get me?"

"Now, you listen to me—" Betty began.

But Uncle John was already purple. "I won't listen," he raved. "Get out of here! You scheming, worthless, impudent hussy, you—"

"Oh, you wretched, mean, vicious old man!" cried Betty. The tears rushed to her eyes, she caught up a paper-weight upon the table, and hurled it at Uncle John's head, breaking the lamp globe, four feet away.

Uncle John sat down, and the next moment Betty was standing over him, breathing defiance and maledictions, till Uncle John sputtered:

"Stop! Stop! Lemme speak!"

"I don't want to hear a word from you, you—"

"It's all right. God bless you both and—"

Betty stopped, mute with astonishment. And now Uncle John was on his feet and wringing her hands warmly, and beaming—positively beaming.

"You've got spirit, girl, more than that miserable Harold. Listen to me. I'm going to post you. It was all fake—understand? I'm the mildest man that ever jumped when the mouse-trap clicked."

"Really?" asked Betty incredulously.

"Eldest child of large family—put upon in youth—tyrannical old father—contemptuous sisters—had to assert myself—so kind they'd have eaten me out of heart and home. I'm giving you the secret for a wedding present—something more, too, but the secret as well—keep the upper hand. There's nothing in the world stands a man or woman in such good stead as a reputation for a fine, furious, unreasonable temper, Betty!"

M. O. WILSON, Secretary, Florence, S. C., September 18, 1922.
Tobacco Growers Cooperative Association, Raleigh, N. C.

The Tobacco Growers Cooperative Association in South Carolina is a splendid success. The city of Florence, including banks and business houses, is 100 per cent cooperative. We feel that we have doubled the price of our entire South Carolina tobacco crop the first year of its operation. Our sales committee is meeting with wonderful success in selling our tobacco at satisfactory prices. Even the non-signers are giving the Association credit for the increase in price. Every one appreciates the orderly manner of marketing as against the old dumping system. When the doors are opened again for signers we expect to see our membership increased to nearly 100 per cent. We consider the movement the financial salvation of the South Carolina tobacco farmer.
