brought the crop to rapid maturity following an unusually dry season during the normal growing period in May and June. This rapid maturity also was the cause of considerable lossage in the fields due to the leaves ripening faster than the farmers were able to put their tobacco in curing barns. It has been estimated that from ten to twelve percent of the crop produced in this area has been lost in the fields due to their abnormally fast ripening and shortage of barns for curing.

Nevertheless, with the price average holding between eighteen and twenty cents on the border markets, farmers, business men, and tobacco warehousemen are looking forward to the opening Tuesday with much anticipation. The general feeling among all concerned is one of optimism, with the prospects bright for a good season for the farmer and the best year in its history for the Ahoskie tobacco market.
