

TEACHING READING.

I have found in the schools that I have seen this winter much more interest in teaching reading than I found last winter.

How to teach classes in the second, third, and fourth readers is a question that puzzles some of the teachers.

Some of these children have been poorly taught and are consequently poor readers. The teacher wants to create an interest in the subject.

Let us hear a recitation by one who has succeeded. The teacher called out a class of eight pupils.

Then the spelling was recited. Each member of the class had written the words on paper of slate.

Each member of the class read and read with emphasis. Now and then one would hesitate or call a word wrong.

That was good teaching. This teacher has had trouble in getting the class up to this standard.

Sometimes the teacher would have the pupils in the class to correct the mistakes. Each member of the class would read and if he made a mistake and the mistake was observed by the other members of the class.

Sometimes the class would be divided into two parts and each part would read against the other.

The division that made fewest mistakes was the successful one. Sometimes the teacher would do all the correcting.

I most earnestly request every teacher to give his or her best efforts to make good readers of our boys and girls.

VICTORY OF THE MEER.

In this installment on the "Victory of the Meer," I will say first, if those conclusions in regard to meekness in the preceding installment are just, as I find it believed of much of that edition, and especially with which, in the opinion, it seems to be invested.
