SAVE ME FROM MY, FRIENDS .- A late Havre paper gives the following account of a dangerous experiment, which had nearly verified the ancient adage of the two stools:---

"The owner of a fine Newfoundland dog, walking the other day on the south jetty with a friend, was bonsting of the qualities of the animal, and the certainty of his saving a man from drowning, which his companion questioned. When they had reached that part of the jetty which is unprotected by any parapet, the master of the dog pushed his incredulous friend into the outer basin', where the water was deep though calm. The dog justified the praises of his master, and instantly plunged after the fallen man, seized him by the coat, and was bringing him safe to shore, when another dog of the same species, which happened to be on the north jetty, saw what was going on, and determined to have his share in the at hand.

He plunged in, seized another portion of the drowning man's coat ; but as the respective master's of the two dogs were at opposite points, they pulled in opposite directions, till two portions of the coat were torn off, and carried by the dogs to their owners, leaving the real object of their endeavors to his fate. This would have been inevitable had not his kind friend, who fortun-
