WANTS.

I ask not for honor, for fame or for wealth, But I want a good home, a farm and good health; I ask not fine houses-to live in high life-But a heap of good friends and an agreeable wife. My friends I would have all around me to live, Be neighbors, as friends, to receive and to give; story in his own words : To visit each other in health or distress-Life's pleasures promote and sorrows repress.

A wife I would have of the medium size, A very neat figure, with black or blue eyes, With a sweet disposition, inclined to be gay, With a knowledge of music, to sing and to play. That, when I come in from the toils of the day, I would have her to mee; me with smiles and to

I'm so glad to see you, the day's been so long, A kiss my dear - ha! then I'll sing you a song. With these, in a temperate clime I'd reside, "With none to molest or to make me afraid," I'd sneer at old fogies, curse the bachelor's life, So now for the home and then for the wife.

And if, by the way, the fates it may please, To bless my bold efforts with comfort and ease, I'll divide with the poor, but old sweet hearts may tease,

I'll have none of them, if to death they all freeze.

ROTATION OF CROPS.

recently delivered before an agricultural convention at Springfield, Ohio, by John H Klippart. Esq. It reviews, at great length, the system of farming as practiced in Europe-especially in Germany-intimating that American farmers they can arrive at the excellence of the former -The cause of the difference observable between these two classes of farmers is asserted to be this. The German makes farming his sole business, while the American has numberless irons in the fire, outside of his agricultural operations. The one expends the surplus of one year's productions in enriching and improving his lands for succeeding crops, till their highest productive capacity is reached. The other devotes that surplus to the purchase of the bank, railroad or oil stock, leaving the farm to its own resources.

The consequence is, the grounds of the one increase yearly in productive power, while those of the other are starved for the lack of due preparation and nourishment. Among the German farmers more attention is paid to a systematic the same class here. On this point we quote from the address as follows: "In Europe there is a regular rotation of crops adapted to the soil -a three-course system, a four-course system, a six, eight, ten or twelve-course system-according to the size of the farm and quality of the soil. The farm is divided into as many fields as there are rotations in the course, or else into putable responsibility represented by us. multiples of the rotations; then, the kind of crop which was grown in field No. 1 last year is grown in field No. 2 this year, and will be grown in field No. 3 next year, and so on till the course is completed. This insures a crop of wheat every year on a different field, and has many advantages; it has the advantage of having the soil properly prepared by previous crops; it is very much less liable to insect depredations, and the crop is every year on a comparatively new soil, and there is, as a rule, a good wheat crop every
