From the New York Observer. A STORM IN THE MOUNTAINS.

BY F. WOODWARD EARL.

See ! mark it rise ! The expanding skies Are covering with the heavy mist, That now in sheets, and now in mass Is drawing o'er the mountain side, And filling up the pass.

Hush ! hark ! a sound, As from the ground, In low, but humming, deep-toned notes-Now strong, now faint, now full, now weak; A moment heard, then lost; and now The very hill-tops speak.

The storm has burst ! So slow, at first, That scarce the ear could tell if true The sounds that moaned above, around : And now the leaden clouds, like night, The whole borizon bound.

And, wild as hell, With fearful yell, The winds tear up the noble trees : The thunders peal-the lightnings flash : And all the world seems wrapped in flame, 'Mid many an awful crash.

'fis past-'tis gone ! And peace alone Lies softly on the sunny cliffs, And every vale and dell will smile Amid the rain-drops-as through tears Laughs out a merry child.
