

Biography of the Plant.

The water which the plant imbibes by its roots becomes sap in the stem, and circulates in every part as the blood circulates in the animal...

By this means the sap is changed into a nourishing food, fitted to sustain the growth of the plant in every part.

In the second stage of growth, when the plant depends no longer upon the seed for nourishment, it goes on increasing in stature and multiplying its leaves and branches.

A flower is, therefore, a leafy branch transformed (as shown in the Class-Book, p. 23), having its axis undeveloped, its leaves in crowded circles, moulded into more delicate forms and tinged with brighter colors.

The fourth stage of plant-life is the period of the fruit-bearing. The flowers have gradually faded and disappeared, but the pistil, having received the quickening pollen, remains in its place, holds fast all the nourishing matter which condescends to flow into it through the flower-stem, grows, and finally ripens into the perfected fruit and seed.

The fifth and last stage in the biography of the plant is its hibernation (winter's sleep), or its death. If the event of flowering and fruit-bearing occur within the first or second year of its life of the plant, it is generally followed by its speedy death.

Honor to the Plow. Though clouds o'ercrest my native sky, And seem to dim the sun, We will not down in languor lie, Or deem the day is done; The rural arts we cherish now; No less we'll cherish you; And crown the banquet, as of yore, With honor to the Plow.

Let Art arrayed in magic power, With Labor hand in hand, Go forth, and now in peril's hour Sustain a sinking land; Let never Sloth uncurve the arm, Or Fear the spirit e'er; These words alone should work a charm— All honor to the Plow.

Lime! Lime!! I am ready to deliver, at the Transportation Depot in Charlotte, any quantity of Lime that may be desired by the ton or bushel, fresh from the Kiln.
