Poetry.

The Maiden's Wish.

BY MISS M. A. WILSON.

Oh! another year, I long to be
On your voluptuous breast
The little feet that once were
Soft as the lily's petals,
Of Alpine mountains when the glow
Of sunset tinges all their snow.

And, mother, in those earlier years
How sweet 'twas to be near
For, far above the living world
And from the city's strife,
To dream away the peaceful hours
Within those fairy snow-curtain bowers.

With no rude notes to pain my ear,
No voice of human wrong,
But borne upon the rippling air
In breathing sweet tones,
The far-off murmurs of the deep
Would breathe of gentleness and love.

And then upon my empty bed,
Free from Earth's thumping wheels,
To lean my weary, throbbing head
And from the city's strife,
To dream away the peaceful hours
Within those fairy snow-curtain bowers.

And then upon my empty bed,
Free from Earth's thumping wheels,
To lean my weary, throbbing head
And from the city's strife,
To dream away the peaceful hours
Within those fairy snow-curtain bowers.

And then upon my empty bed,
Free from Earth's thumping wheels,
To lean my weary, throbbing head
And from the city's strife,
To dream away the peaceful hours
Within those fairy snow-curtain bowers.

And then upon my empty bed,
Free from Earth's thumping wheels,
To lean my weary, throbbing head
And from the city's strife,
To dream away the peaceful hours
Within those fairy snow-curtain bowers.

And then upon my empty bed,
Free from Earth's thumping wheels,
To lean my weary, throbbing head
And from the city's strife,
To dream away the peaceful hours
Within those fairy snow-curtain bowers.

And then upon my empty bed,
Free from Earth's thumping wheels,
To lean my weary, throbbing head
And from the city's strife,
To dream away the peaceful hours
Within those fairy snow-curtain bowers.

And then upon my empty bed,
Free from Earth's thumping wheels,
To lean my weary, throbbing head
And from the city's strife,
To dream away the peaceful hours
Within those fairy snow-curtain bowers.

And then upon my empty bed,
Free from Earth's thumping wheels,
