Poetry.

THE FOREST TREES.

Up with your heads, ye green forest trees, Wave proudly in the breeze;
For our cradle beds and coffin boards, Must come from the forest trees.

We bless ye for your summer shade,
When our weak limbs fail and tire;
Our thanks are due for your winter aid,
When we pile the bright log fire.

Oh! where would be our sails on the sea,
And the frame of the sailor boat,
Were it not for the oak and chestnut-crowned pine,
That spring on the quiet land?

When the ribs and the masts of the good ships Are made of the forest trees.

And weather the gale with ease, Take the glow from the fire which will not give A health to the forest trees.

Ye lead to life the earliest joy,
And wait on the sick and dying,
In the cradle and the coffin board,
And the shroud for the dying.

The old man totters on his way,
With footsteps short and slow,
But without the stick for his help and stay,
Not a yard's length could he go.

The hoarse cry in the straggling's hand, Both sage power to please;
And to the sturdy staff and slender wand Are plucked from the forest trees.

"Give me your money," demanded the young man, "or I'll blow you through."

"Young man," said the preacher, "what has brought you to this? You cannot pull that trigger. You have never robbed any one. This is your first attempt. When a child, you were taught better things. Your mother—"

Here the young man instantly lowered the muzzle of his gun, hesitated, threw it on the ground, and burst into tears.

"It is my first attempt," said he. "I was indeed taught better things."

The preacher dismounted from his horse, and made the young man sit down by him on the fragment of a rock. Here, with no little difficulty, he induced the young robber to give him an outline of his history.—

It may be comprised in a few words. He was a Virginian, of wealthy, religious, and highly respectable parents. Two years previously he had married a young lady, whose parents' conviction were not below that of his own. For some reason the parents on both sides opposed the match, and the young people eloped, carrying little with er than what they were together. They received nothing from their parents; in fact the latter knew not whether they had gone!

They had ventured out to this wild country, and had managed to live, up to this time, though with no little difficulty. Both had recently been sick. They had no neighbors, no friends, none to whom in an hour they could appeal for aid. Reduced to the very point of starvation, the preacher had suggested that he should make just one little robbery; only a few dollars would do, until he could make other arrangements. For three days he had been watching this trace, and Mr. Uragg was the first to pass.

Closely did the young preacher observe every motion, tone of voice, and lineament in the countenance of the young man. His manner was so true to nature, and his penitence seemed so deep and thorough, that Mr. Uragg believed his narrative without scruple.

"You have erred most sadly," said he.

"There is that who was both willing and able to do you in your time of need, who is present in the wilderness as well as in the city, and who never turns away empty those who call upon him. You have yielded to the tempter, and have been by him brought well nigh to the brink of destruction. That kind Providence who never forgets the fallen, and they are lost, has forever, but doubtless thrown you into my hands. I trust that you can be still redeemed from ruin and infamy. I too am poor—that horse, saddle and saddle bags, a few clothes, a few books, and a few dollars, constitute all my earthly possessions.

I own no lot of land—no cottage in the wilderness. But I have no dependent family, and you need my money more than I do." He arose, took down his saddle bag, and drew out an old woolen sock, and counted out thirty silver dollars, from which he took one dollar, and putting it into his pocket he said:

"Promise me in the presence of the Judge of all the earth, that hereafter you will seek to do right, and under no circumstances, attempt to rob any one again."
