The evidence induced by the State was overwhelmingly convincing, and this was most powerfully augmented by the defendant himself who, in weaving that tangled web, man so often weaves when struggling to mislead and deceive, got the threads that his own tongue spun so inextricably confused and mixed that every effort made to straighten them out only served to tighten and harden the knot of his guilt and conviction. Every struggle therefore made for release bound him closer and closer to the thorny bed he himself spread; and so the Jury had no difficulty in finding him guilty.
