

ANARCHISTS CONVICTED. Found Guilty of Murder in the First Degree.

All the Defendants to Hang Except Neebe.

CHICAGO, Aug. 20.—People tried to get into the criminal court room as early as 9 o'clock this morning, and the first applicant was a woman who became very angry when refused admission. She appealed to every one of the forty officers gathered about, but they were firm in their refusal and 500 people, who applied between that time and 9 o'clock, were given the same answer. Every conceivable ruse was resorted to, but the officers were inexorable, and when the verdict was brought in there were probably less people in the court room than at any time during the trial. The crowd outside numbered about 1,000 people and these were kept informed of the progress inside by the police. Some of the people succeeded in getting up stairs and took seats at the west end of the room, were Mrs. Spies, Mrs. Parsons, Neebe's wife, Lingg's sweetheart, August Spies' mother and his brother, Ferdinand, Mrs. Amos, General Parsons, Spies' mother and half dozen others who have been regular attendants at the trial. Judge Gary was on time and at four minutes to ten the court was opened and the judge sang out to the spectators to take seats and not make a demonstration. The prisoners were then brought in and ranged along the south wall by the windows. The judge then turned and told the clerk to call the names of the jury. This was done amid oppressive silence except one on the part of Neebe, who was probably the most affected of the prisoners. Neebe turned and looked across the room to the place where his wife was sitting. He craned his neck forward and said something in an undertone to himself. Parsons looked straight ahead to the place where his brother, the general, was standing. He turned and looked into the street where, under the burning sun, a thousand men and women gazed anxiously at the upper windows. Parsons glanced hurriedly around and with a bold, defiant look in his eyes, pulled something from his pocket. It was the anarchists' battle flag, a dirty, red silk handkerchief. Turning so that all in the streets might see, but in such a manner that the court could not, he waived it for a moment or two. Some one on the street caught sight of it and a cheer was uttered but quickly stopped. When the people in the courtroom turned to ascertain the cause of the demonstration Parsons sat stiffly in his chair and gazed vacantly at the clock. The others gazed anxiously into the faces of the jury and their friends and then up at the dignified judge, as if in the hope of gleaming some indication of their fate. The relatives and friends of the prisoners were the most affected. Over in a corner sat a little old woman nearly hidden by a big policeman. It was the mother of August Spies, and during the half hour that she was in the court room she was constantly holding a white handkerchief to her eyes. Mrs. Parsons and Gen. Parsons said nothing and betrayed no evidence of the suspense that they must have experienced. Mrs. Schwab looked at her husband with fearful eyes, and once or twice wiped the tears away. Lingg's sweetheart was next to her and during the calling of the jurors names kept up a constant signaling with him.

THE VERDICT. The roll call was finally finished and then it was that the prisoners and their friends betrayed the first excitement. Just two minutes after ten Foreman Osborne rose to his feet and faced the court. The suspense was terrible and as if already aware of the fate in store for them, a tremor ran over the prisoners, while the feelings of their relatives and friends were manifested by twitching of the muscles, hard breathing and shaking limbs. "Have you agreed upon a verdict?" and the voice of the judge was almost inaudible, and even he gave way to the momentary solemnity and suspense. "Have you agreed?" Then all eyes were withdrawn from him and turned on the foreman, who reached forward and the paper which he held in his hand to the clerk, who in turn gave it to the judge. The foreman's work was done. The judge and the clerk held a whispered conversation and finally the clerk raised the paper where the light could fall on it and the judge bent forward and fixed his eyes on the spectators. The people were like marble figures, not a word or sign did they make, but their eyes merely shifted from the judge to the clerk. The latter then began reading slowly as follows: "We find Spies, Parsons, Fielden, Schwab, Fischer, Lingg and Engel guilty as charged in the indictment and punishable by death. We find Neebe guilty of manslaughter and fix his punishment at fifteen years in the penitentiary."

The clerk then sat down, but the judge and the foreman remained standing. There was not a sound, and for over a minute people seemed to be dumb stricken. Then there was a faint sob, a low, wailing moan. It came from the corner where the little old mother of Spies sat, and it was the signal for the outbreak of murmurs which ran over the assemblage. "Everybody sit down," and the judge's voice rang out clear and distinct, but even his authority could not prevent the expressions of surprise and outburst of pent up feeling, and the suppressed murmur of anguish that came from the friends and relatives of the condemned men. The unfortunate defendants themselves said nothing; not even did they move. They only looked out into space, as if all hope had gone, and now for the first time they knew their lives had been a failure. The judge was the first to make a movement. Stepping to the front he ordered that the jurors be polled. Each juror was then asked by the clerk if the verdict expressed his true convictions, and if he agreed in the verdict. In answer came a firm "I do." Then the judge glanced for the first time at the prisoners and their friends. He allowed his eyes to rest for a moment on the cringing forms of the little old mother, weeping sisters and wives. Then, bringing his eyes to the jury again, he told them that they had done their work well. You have listened attentively to the evidence given in every detail both for and against the prisoners; your close attention, and your verdict is an expression of your convictions. This has been a long and tedious trial, but you have tion." The judge then, in a few words, discharged the jury, and notified them that they were at liberty to go. There was not one of the twelve good and true men but looked thankful and drew a sigh of relief. The jury then rose and filed out of the room and the hall made their way to the sides of the prisoners.

Not one word escaped any one of the eight. Their faces still wore the same vacant look, as they rose from their seats and followed the bailiffs, it was with a slow and unsteady step. As they reached the door Lingg turned and looked at his sweetheart, and his anguish was apparent by the tears in his eyes. As her eyes met those of her lover tears burst out afresh. Grim and uncouth, Michael Schwab also turned and he was just in time to hear a heartrending shriek from his wife and saw her fall against the seat. He made a motion toward her, but collected himself and went out with the rest. "Ach Gott!" shrieked the wife, "Ach Gott!" Then her utterances took the form of raving, and she fell back into a deadfaint. Restoratives were applied and when she regained consciousness again she resumed her cries. Some of her female friends finally quieted her and even Judge Gary came down from the bench and looked pityingly at her. She was then taken out of the room and the others followed. Mrs. Parsons did not seem very much agitated, though she bit her lips and looked at the judge and the people with strained eyes as if to keep back the tears. Spies' mother went out still weeping and clinging to her daughter's dress and tears gushed from her eyes freely. The other women also wept and the crowd in the street stood aside in a respectful manner to let them pass.

Judge Gary came down shortly after, and a great many persons lifted their hats as he passed. The court room was cleared and people went away to their homes and their work. The trial of the "Reds" was over. Before adjournment Judge Gary set the time for any motions by the defense for next Thursday.

A reporter for the United Press found a couple of the jurors after they had made their escape from the building and questioned them regarding their deliberations when they retired to the jury room. Yesterday afternoon the first thing they agreed on was to keep their work in the jury room, except as regarded general information, a profound secret, for reasons which they refused to divulge, but which they considered competent. A thorough discussion of the contested points in the testimony was gone into, as well as all the phases of the case which the jury had become acquainted with during their long sittings. There were some differences of opinion, but in the main the jurors were agreed upon the disposition of the prisoners. What their differences were they will not tell. They then proceeded to ballot on each of the prisoners separately. The result of the first ballot, or any of them, or how many it took before the verdict was reached is a matter on which they will not give information. They conducted their work and had their verdict ready at 7:30 last evening before they left the jury room for supper. "We had plenty of time for thinking the matter over during the trial as the evidence was voluminous and the arguments exhaustive," said one of the jurors. "And we had come to look on the matter dispassionately. There was no feeling in the matter for or against the prisoners; we calmly reviewed the evidence and found the verdict accordingly. We didn't consider that the claim that the throwing of the bomb was acting independently of the leaders was reasonable enough to admit of judicial doubt, and even if he was acting independently it was the teaching and the pleading of Spies and his followers that caused him to throw it. In any event murder was the outgrowth of the inflammatory exhortations of the anarchists."

During the excitement and general exultation upon the streets attendant upon the verdict, a wooden-legged newspaper vendor on the corner of Washington and Lasalle streets, named Henry Bendix, better known as "Corky," remarked in a loud tone that "the jury ought to be hanged." Instantly the crowd of citizens put their pennies in their pockets and moved on the fellow in a threatening manner. From a low growl the crowd gradually broke into a howl and rushed upon the fellow with shouts of "Hang him!" "Lynch him!" Officer C. J. Morris, of the central detail of police, broke through the excited throng and rescued the fellow before violent hands were laid upon him. He was taken to the Central station where, with tearful face and trembling voice, he said he was just jesting. Nevertheless, he was taken to a cell amid the shouts of approval of a number of excited citizens.

PREDICTING DANGER. Mr. Grinnell, his assistants, Messrs. Ingham, Walker and Furthmann, Mr. Foster and Inspector Bonfield, sat in the former's office chatting an hour after the verdict was rendered. "I feel very sorry for the jurors," said Mr. Foster, impressively. "If the day ever comes that the ropes are placed about the necks of these prisoners, the members of the jury will not be out of danger. I have urged the prisoners to have all their friends exercise their influence against violence between now and the end of the case." "I want to say," interposed Inspector Bonfield, "that if any violence is done by the friends of those men that will bear fruit. In my opinion the police will be powerless to quell the popular rage, and public vengeance will be summarily wreaked upon all the friends and pronounced sympathizers of anarchy."

A Tried Remedy for Biliousness. Those who suffer from disorder or inaction of the liver will never get the upper hand of the unruly organ so long as they use such irrational remedies as blue pill, calomel and podophyllin. But from the tried and popular medicine, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, they may expect relief with a certainty of obtaining it. The influence of the Bitters upon the great biliary gland is direct, powerful and speedily felt. The relief afforded is not spasmodic, but complete and permanent. The lowness of the skin, dried appearance of the tongue, indigestion, costiveness, headache, nausea, pains through the right side and shoulder, in fact every accompaniment of the obstinate complaint are entirely and promptly removed by a course of this estimable medicine, in behalf of which testimony is constantly emanating from every quarter, and from all classes of society.

THE TORY PARLIAMENT. Convened to Perform Special Financial Legislation.

LONDON, Aug. 19.—The new parliament was opened to-day. The Lord High Chancellor, Baron Halsbury, read the speech from the throne, which was in substance as follows: "My Lords and Gentlemen of the House of Commons: I have summoned you at this unusual season for the transaction of indispensable business. The session of the last parliament was interrupted before the ordinary work was completed, that the sense of the people might be taken with regard to proposed changes in the government of Ireland. The result of this appeal confirmed the conclusion of the late Parliament. The temporary arrangement of the last Parliament for the public charge renders it inexpedient to further postpone the consideration of necessary financial legislation. The estimate submitted to the last Parliament and partially voted will be laid before you. I abstain at present from recommending any measures except those essential to the conduct of public service for the rest of the fiscal year. I am confident that they will receive your prompt and careful attention." The Times announces the appointment of two royal commissions, the first to inquire into the agrarian difficulties in Ireland, and the second to consider the matter of arterial drainage and to investigate the affairs of the public works.

A LETTER FROM THE PRESIDENT.

WASHINGTON, August 21.—The following correspondence, in reference to the appointment of Recorder Matthews, after his rejection by the Senate, has been made public. Soon after the appointment was made, Mr. T. McC. Stewart, of Philadelphia, wrote to the President, approving his action, and saying that it was a tribute to narrow-minded men of both parties, and that the administration was liberalizing and dividing the colored vote. To this letter the President replied as follows, under date of August 11th:

"EXECUTIVE MANSION, "WASHINGTON, August 11, 1886. "My Dear Sir—I cannot resist the temptation to absolutely steal time enough to acknowledge the receipt of your gratifying letter in relation to the reappointment of Mr. Matthews. "I very much hope that this will not be regarded as in any way defiant to the Senate or as an attempt to appear heroic.

"I have deemed the question involved in this matter as one rising above politics, and as offering a test of good faith and adherence to pledges—nothing more or less. When this thing is put face to face there should be no shuffling. It is absurd to promise all and perform nothing. If a colored man is worthy of the country, he is absolutely entitled to its full participation every honorable man.

"I am glad you are pleased, but fail to see how I am entitled to especial credit for being honest. "Yours truly, "GROVER CLEVELAND. "To T. McCANTS STEWART. A number of prominent citizens unite in saying that they can see nothing in this correspondence bearing on the propriety of making and persisting in a district appointment against the wishes of the people of the district, and from another part of the country. They fail to see how the principles cited in the President's letter were involved at all in the matter. Both the afternoon papers discuss the matter.

HOG CHOLERA.

Hogs with cholera should be kept in an enclosure in which there is no running stream, no pond of water, and they are exceedingly thirsty and will drink to disadvantage if allowed, and if die they must, be found in water or as near it as possible. A simple and safe cure is asafetida, which is also a preventative. A weak solution at first, kept in a hog-trough, then made stronger when they have learned to drink it. Sick hogs are not fond of this, but will drink it if kept from fresh water. Tie in a cloth a portion of asafetida as large as a man's fist, more or less. Weight so as to keep it under water. This is beneficial to hogs the year around, and also to fowls.
