Packaged Meat The quality of frozen food suffers The quality of frozen food suffers if poor packaging materials are used and if packaging is done carelessly. In experiments to determine the best packaging materials for frozen foods, uniform quality pork chops and ground beef were wrapped in locker paper or in cellophane. For six months the packages were weighed at intervals to determine the loss of moisture, and cellophane excelled in this respect, but it is about twice as expensive as is butcher paper. Several thickas is butcher paper. Several thick-nesses of locker paper were more protective than was one laver.
