Governor at Faanklinton.

Quite a large crowd was out to hear Governor W. W. Kitchen speak here last Tuesday evening. The Governor was at his best and delivered one of the best speeches ever heard here. He was introduced by Supt. R. B. White in a short speech. The Governor first paid his compliments to the character of the Republican party in North Carolina, stating that he was making a very broad assertion, but that if any member of that party were put on the witness stand he would be bound to admit that the party was not respectable. He next attacked the record of the party. He said that a Republican seeking office would never boast of the record the Republican party had made in North Carolina, but always promised to do better than his predecessors. The Governor said that the Republican party was made up of dissatisfied Democrats in North Carolina and Federal office holders; that Marion Butler and Morehead were Democrats just a few years back and that his old friend and college mate Cooley, who claimed to be an independent Democrat, was the only man in North Carolina who believed it today, saying that two years hence he would be a full fledged Republican. He next showed the public institutions of the State had flourished under the Democratic administration and gone backward under Republican. His attack on the tariff was excellent. He then asked why this insurgent movement in the North and West? This, he said, meant that they were waking up and would not be fooled again by the waving of the bloody shirt and the question "if they would let this old Southern Democratic party who tried to break the Union again come into power." This, he said did not put anything into their pockets. Governor Kitchen said that he believed with Butler and Morehead, that there should be two parties in North Carolina—the Democratic for the good and the Republican for the bad. The Governor was followed in a short speech by State Treasurer Ben Lacy. They left on 43 for Raleigh.
