You may preach sermons and advocale reforms and denounce wickedness, and yet your children will be of sin unless you can make your any other place on earth to them.

The virtues grow about the home. They cluster, bloom and shed their perfume around the fire. Love, husband, wife, father, mother, child and home-without those words the world would be a barren wilderness and men and women but brutish beasts,

We love to see people live well, says a thoughtful writer, and to pure white clothes all the season dress respectfully, and enjoy themselves, but there is a happy meaning in all these things, and when that is passed in the direction of extravagance, the people distress and enslave themselves and diminish their ability to do good. For the sake of keeping up the styles, people live far above their income, harass themselves with debt, wear themselves Cout, and keep themselves in a constant nervous strain by giving fashionable dinners, fashionably entertaining and making fashionable calls. . . .

All social circles welcome ch'erfulness. A sunny face is an open pleasure to hearts and homes. By it burdens are lightened, care dispelled, sorrow banished, and hope made to reign triumphant where fear and doubt and despondency held high carnival. But much depende amples the scars will remain and his upon how we interpret the word "well" Usually it is applied to a . . . young man's income or financial possessions. When this is the case, the standard used is an unfortunate one. There is not a more eruel standard ceptivated by the glittering saloon by which to measure a young man than the position he is able to offer home a brighter place than earth to the girl of his choice. We do not advocate the "love in a cottage" theory, by any means, but we do believe in the good oldsfashioned theory of a young couple starting out into the world with a modern income, and the climbing upward tegether.

..... Too many mothers consider their children as simple objects for the display of their own vanity and pride. Little Mary must be kept in through, though neither the father's purse nor the mother's strength is sufficient to provide the numberless changes necessary. Instead of dressing the child in sensible frocks of blue flannel, such as millionaire's children are not ashamed to wear for play dresses, every effort is strained to reach this false ideal of dress which the mother has set up for herself. She sits up into the wee small hours of the night working on dainty gowns in which all the childish impulses for play are stifled forever in dress array.

The Last Chance It Led to Proof of True Friendshin

-----A dirty looking Mexican had brought the roughly scrawled note to the Lone Bull ranch. It was at the edge of the evening, and the extended absence of light hearted Harry Barry had been a matter of comment among his com-rades. His two weeks' leave of absence had been stretched to three, and. although work was dull at this season. his silence caused a vague disquietude

The note was addressed to Gabriel, and he unfolded it with the careful deliberation of one who seldom receives an epistie. He held the torn sheet of paper close to the lamp and scanned the words with sharp eyes that narrowed to mere pin points of light when he had concluded.

"It's from him," he said, with a curt nod toward Harry Barry's empty chair. They scented trouble in the tone of his voice. Gabriel was not given to emotion, but he had grown attached to Harry Barry and loved him as a

"What's happened?" demanded Jim Lewis,

For answer Gabriel tossed the note across the table, and Jim seized it eagerly and read aloud:

Come to the three cottonwoods and ring the boys to celebrate. It's the last H. B.

Hardened though they were, the faces of the four blanched as the meaning of the words smote them strongly. The three fall cottonwoods that stood near Satan's Gulch marked a spot that was recognized throughout the adjacent cattle country as a place where the swift justice of the plains was meted out to offenders.

Without a word the four arose and reached for their hats. In the same grim silence they strode out of the bunk house, forgetful of the Mexican who crouched in the veranda as they Dassed.

They were three miles on their way toward Satan's Gulch when the Cran broke the silence. "What became of the greaser?" he asked suddenly.

"I forgot him," admitted Gabriel. "Did anybody pay him for the letter?" "You paid him yourself, Gabe. I saw you flip him four bits." remarked Jim Lewis.

They all grew sllent once more, thinking perhaps of the merry even-ings spent under the star dusted sky or in the shelter of the bunk hous with Harry Barry, the pivotal center about which good humor swung. "There's only one thing Harry might do," growled Gabriel from the depth of a troubled heart.

"And he wouldn't do that unless he was pushed to wrangle. Harry, he wasn't one to force gun play." ndded Jim Lewis seriously. "If Harry did drop his man it would be in a fair fight, and there wouldn't be no cause to"- The Crane's pause was significant.

They rode on across the shriveled grasses and down dry water courses, heading always for the southeast and yet ever dreading to glimpse the gaunt outline of the cottonwoods against the sky. A young moon slipped down the western spaces, and after awhile there was no light save that of the stars, and in the soft radiance they move on their way to take advantage of their last chance to say farewell Harry Barry.

It was Gabriel's eyes that first saw the black cottonwoods, and he halted his horse with a sudden jerk and stopped the progress of the other men. "I got something to say," he mut-tered hoarsely. "We all know that what's going to happen in the me can't be stopped just because Harry

They nodded silently, but there was not one of them, Gabriel included, who did not register a mental vow to attempt to free Harry Barry before the dawn broke.

Almost within the shadow of the trees the four halted their horses and peered into the gloom. Jim Lewis slipped from his saddle and cautious ly reconnoitered. Presently he came back and spoke breathlessly.

Leading his own horse and followed by the others, Jim Lewis cautiously led the way into the deeper shadows where Harry Barry was sleeping They were somewhat puzzled at the absence of his captors, but Satan's Gulch presented many rocks and cran nies that might be preferred to the star canopied sky as sleeping quarters, and probably the condemned man was bound and beipless. Presently they discorned the outline of a picketed horse and not far away a dark bundle on the ground that
