MUSIC IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

The true importance of music in the public schools has only begun to be realized by American educators and the American public. As a public school subject, music is comparatively new, the pioneer work in this field dating no further back than the middle of the last century. A great awakening is in process, however, and truly remarkable development has occurred all over the country during the last decade or decade and a half.

In North Carolina this development has been much less rapid than in most other parts of the country. In 1917 only 23 per cent of the cities in North Carolina with a population of over 3,000 had special teachers of music in the public schools; only one other state, Maryland, had an equally small percentage. Next in order came Arkansas with 24 per cent, Florida with 25 per cent, Tennessee with 33 per cent, Texas with 34 per cent, Georgia with 37 per cent, and Oklahoma with 46 per cent. These ten states were below 50 per cent, all the other states were above 50 per cent, with 15 above 80 per cent and two states (South Dakota and Montana) ranking 100 per cent. Another important gauge of the extent and effectiveness of music in the public schools in North Carolina is to be found in the condition of students entering the State University. A considerable number of these students has been examined since September, 1919; very few have been found to have even a slight reading knowledge of music (except students who have had private instruction); very few, in fact, had gained more than a superficial smattering along any line of musical knowledge from their public school education.

There has been some improvement in these conditions in North Carolina since 1917, the date of the figures given just above. Between 1917 and 1920 the percentage of cities of 3,000 and more population employing special teachers of public school music increased from 23 per cent to 25 per cent. Of the cities numbering 1,000 to 3,000 population, only 10 per cent employed such special teachers in 1920; but this percentage, also, is greater than that for the same group of cities in 1917. It is known that several cities in the State plan to inaugurate this work soon. And, more hopeful still, other cities are substituting up-to-date methods and materials and courses of study for antiquated and ineffective ones used until now.

It is not our purpose in this bulletin to urge or justify the place of music in the educational system; nor to suggest specific methods or devices for the carrying out of school music work. It is, rather, our purpose to set forth the general plan for the development of school music as it has been worked out in hundreds of cities throughout the country; to evaluate certain local developments in the light of this general development; and to suggest, in a very brief bibliography, sources of definite information on some of the points here made.

Basis of School Music Is Vocal Music

Out of every hundred school children at least ninety-five can be taught to sing; it is probable that not more than one in this hundred would learn to play the flute or the French horn; and that not more than ten or fifteen would learn to play the piano or the violin. It is the ninety-five for whom we must provide first. The basis of school music, therefore, must be vocal music; not only because more children have latent vocal ability, but because vocal music gives the greatest opportunities for general participation of practically all the children at the same time. It is this socializing aspect of vocal music which make it one of the strongest agencies in the development of school spirit. Practically all school children can and should be taught to read vocal music, in school by the time they reach the upper grades they should be able to sing at sight music written in two and three parts, and at the end of the high school period they should be able to read at sight four-part music of considerable difficulty.

In every group of school children will be found a certain percentage who have special ability or aptitude for the learning of instrumental music. After vocal music has been provided for the greater number, instrumental instruction should be provided for the smaller number. And this instruction must be furnished either free or at such a nominal cost to the individual pupil that lack of means will not prevent the development of the child who may be richly endowed by nature but poorly provided with the world's goods. The newer systems of class instruction in violin, piano and other instruments make this entirely practical even in small and comparatively struggling communities.

From the standpoint of their future use of music, school children are divided into two classes: in the larger class is made up of those to whom music will be an avocation, a matter of culture, a useful employment of leisure time; the smaller class is made up of those who will enter some phase of professional musical life, either as performers or composers or members of the various musical trades. And when one considers our national expenditures for music, this "smaller" group attains a very considerable importance. For instance, in 1914 we spent as a nation about $600,000,000 on music in all forms; and in the same year we spent $44,000,000 in the cotton industry, $52,000,000 in the automobile industry, $380,000,000 on electrical machinery, etc. In 1910 there were 152,119 musicians and music teachers in the United States; in the same year there were 118,918 clergymen, 114,794 judges and lawyers, 51,564 civil, mechanical and electrical engineers and 52,843 teachers in high schools. For this "smaller" group of school children who will enter music as a profession, special training should be offered along theoretical lines; the study of the history of music, musical lit-
