A Century-Old Effort to Free Europe of Dependence Upon the South for Cotton

More than seventy years ago Charles Dickens, after enumerating many striking facts in regard to England's cotton trade, said:

"Let any great social or physical convulsion visit the United States and England would feel the shock from Land's End to John O'Groats's. The lives of nearly two millions of our countrymen are dependent upon the cotton crops of America. Their destiny may be said, without any kind of hyperbole, to hang upon a thread. Dickens was arguing at that time, as were many other English writers, statesmen and manufacturers, about the supreme importance to England of its cotton industry.

In 1858 Lord Palmerston, in an address in Parliament, said: "I venture to say that you will find on the West coast of Africa a most valuable supply of cotton, so essential to the manufacturers of this country." At other times in Parliament, in the reports of the British Board of Trade, and in the discussions of cotton manufacturers in Lancashire, emphasis was constantly laid upon the need of growing cotton in other parts of the world to lessen the dependence of Great Britain upon Southern raised cotton. In those early days, even a century ago, much stress was placed upon the importance to England of low prices for cotton. A report to the British Board of Trade urged that English manufacturers should do all in their power to hold down the price of cotton, and that report claimed that this would be the way in which to force the South to raise a larger crop, since the planters would seek by a larger yield to secure more money than they could get from a small yield at high prices.

These old discussions of 75 to 100 years ago, which have continued down to the present hour, are of much significance to the South, and, indeed, to the whole cotton world. Without knowledge of them no one can properly understand the present agitation in Europe for cotton production in other countries and the continued methods adopted to break down the price of American cotton.

On August 16, 1921, Mr. Arno S. Pearce, General Secretary of the International Federation of Master Cotton Spinners and Manufacturers Associations of Europe, in an address in Rio de Janeiro, made after the visit of the International Cotton Mission to that country, referred to cotton growing in the United States and said:

"The high wages ruling there make the growing of cotton unremunerative, and we were told on the authority of the president of the Cotton Farmers Union that the AMERICAN COTTON FARMER WOULD NO MORE CONTINUE TO ALLOW HIS WIFE AND CHILDREN TO WORK IN THE FIELDS. With such fantastic ideas it cannot be expected that there will be an increase in the cotton acreage of the United States of America."

This official representative of European cotton manufacturers regarded the desire of American cotton growers to keep their wives and children out of the cotton fields as "fantastic ideas."

In the Blue Book of Southern Progress, which will be issued within a few weeks by the Manufacturers Record, the story of these efforts to break down the price of cotton and to increase cotton production in other parts of the world will be told briefly, but with sufficient comprehensiveness to make it invaluable to every man and woman in America seeking to know the facts. This history, bearing on the cotton trade, is however only one of the hundreds of equally interesting things relating to the welfare of the South and of the country at large to be found in the Blue Book of Southern Progress.—Manufacturers Record.

Brocade Wraps

Practically all of the summer evening wraps are of brocaded satins, heavily crusted with the designs. The patterns are large conventionalized flowers, scrolls and geometric figures. For daytime wear wraps are soberer. Usually crepe is the material—silk crepe is popular in the grays or tans of spring.

Stability of This Nation Rests With Rural Press

The power and importance of the rural press, the average country weekly, is emphasized by the manufacturer and Industrial News, one of the country's greatest publications, in the following estimate given by that publication, which says: "We believe the stability of this nation rests in the hands of the rural editors. Radical elements congregate in the cities. The destructive and yellow press is located in the metropolitan centers. The home owner and the farmer who are the backbone of the nation read the rural papers and it is these same every day Americans who must keep this country on an even keel. Destroy the power and influence of the rural newspaper in its great work of development of rural communities and you have destroyed the greatest advocate of highest ideals and purest Americanism. No institution can or does wield a more powerful influence for good, yet how often such a potent factor in a community's progress and general uplift is not fully appreciated by those whose every destiny rests in the hands of the rural press.

Louisburg High School Defeats Wilton 9 to 3
