A BARBER, A BANKER, AND A CIRCUS SPIEL

"Go to the circus?" asked the cashier of the Bank of Fentonville as he dropped back in the barber's chair for his Saturday afternoon shave.

"Yeah; I went a little while last night after I closed up. Some Circus!"

"Some circus is right," said the banker, "and it was some advertising stunt we pulled. You saw our big sign and heard the ringmaster tell about our bank, didn't you?"

"Yeah; I saw the sign and I heard the spiel. Wouldn't have thought of it again though if you hadn't mentioned it."

"Pretty clever stunt we call it," was the banker's reply.

"Yeah; clever for the announcer and sign painter. What did it cost you?" the barber asked sharply.

The question popped out so unexpectedly that for once the banker told the bank's business and admitted proudly the expense had been $112.

"Say you! Listen to me—" bawled the barber, as he swung his lather brush across his patrons face and shut off anything he might have said further. "That guy paid $12 for the sign and got a hundred for shouting three minutes twice a day. He does that six days a week because he finds one in every town. In the season he makes more than your bank does. You call that advertising? You got an idea folks at the circus bring any money to your bank because of a spiel at a three ring circus? Nothing to it! They were laughing at clowns or getting nervous about the lions. If you want to do some advertising, you take your $112 and pay the editor of The Bugle $2 a week as long as the money lasts. Your ads in the paper will tell all of those people about your bank every time they lock it over, something different every week. It won't go in one ear and out the other."

The barber was quiet for almost a minute. The banker was quiet too. He was thinking. The barber had told him something.

Then from the barber, rather gently, "Did that fellow deposit the $112 in your bank? No? Well whenever you pay the editor's bills he puts the money right back in circulation here."

"Razor-hurt? Not I thought you kinda scinged a little."

Brunswick County women continue to take in about $75 in cash each Saturday at the Women's Exchange Market in Wilmington, reports the home agent.

"The best paying job I ever had," said one farmer who selected his seed corn in the field. This man increased his acre yields the next year.

If you lose at the fair, don't crouch; if you win don't grouch. Find out why you did either. The judges will explain.
