MANUFACTURERS AND CO-OPERATIVES

Have the tobacco manufacturers joined the Co-operative association? Hitherto the craft of warehousemen has seemed to have the support of the great manufacturing corporations in its bitter battle against cooperative marketing, and the prices on the auction floors have been well supported. Growers content to reap where other have sown have openly blessed the co-operative association while continuing to refuse to join it; satisfied that the non-member has profited greatly by the disposition of the buyers to aid in killing it off by paying top prices to non-participants in every market in the three states.

The association has so far obstinately declined to die. It has in its membership a number of doggedly persistent men, who have continued to resist not only the ancient craft of the auction system, which has lived fat and soft these many decades, and fights for its pleasant existence; and the indifference, if not the active hostility, of the manufacturers; but also the inertia of the growers, so long accustomed to spend a summer's labor for a pittance from the consuming public as represented by the old system of marketing.

What have the manufacturers to lose if they should decline further to aid and abet the auction warehouses—thus in effect casting the support of the vast power to the co-operatives? It is a question not so easy to answer as what have they to gain? That is simplicity in operation of the buying side of their business. The maker of smoking tobacco, cigarettes or plug, wishes a few thousand or a few million pounds of weed of a certain quality. If the business of the co-operative association is conducted efficiently, all the manufacturer has to do is to place an order for the amount needed of the specified grade; and there is no reason to believe that the business of the association has not so far been conducted efficiently. In the past it has been necessary for the manufacturer to have a man on every market floor. These buyers must be fairly expert in judgment of tobacco, and their services are by no means cheap.

The overhead of tobacco selling, the warehouse personnel, including men to canvass the district in behalf of each warehouse, during the growing season, the duplication of buyers and of forces for handling the crop after it is placed on the warehouse floor, the necessity of each company maintaining storage facilities, has been so heavy that the farmers would profit heavily if only the bulk of the overhead might be transferred to the price they receive. In theory that transfer is effected by the co-operative system, and if the manufacturers should withdraw their support from the auction people, it will be proof conclusive that the theory works out in practice. It will mean that the manufacturers will get their stock cheaper, in all probability, which is not vitally important to them since they have so far been able to
