TAR DROPS

A PREMIUM OF IDLENESS

The Saturday Evening Post tells a story of an eastern textile manufacturer of middle age who rebelled against high surtaxes. He closed his mill, liquidated his capital and put the proceeds into tax-free securities. He now spends his time in travel and recreation. This is what he says about it:

"Why should I keep factory hours, subject my capital to the risks of business, wear myself out in the daily grind and then hand over fifty-eight per cent of my profits to the federal government, and another large slice to the state and local tax collectors? My tax-free bonds yield me more dollars than I can call my own than my business did before I gave it up. The government that penalized me when I was a useful and productive citizen now puts a premium on my idleness."

The Green Amendment to the constitution which has been before Congress, to do away with future issues of tax-exempt bonds, was defeated on February 8th, 1924, by the narrow margin of 7 votes less than the two-thirds required.

Many speakers who opposed the amendment spent more time abusing those who favored it than in presenting economic arguments against it.

Lazy wealth will enjoy another year of idleness in tax-exempt bonds, but public demand for a square deal in taxation grows stronger every year.

Father Sage Says:

"The most idealistic person in the world is the young man just twenty-one—but watch him change during the next ten years."

Winsome Small Hats for Midsummer Wear

Three winsome hats for midsummer foretell the continued vogue of small shapes, which is not disturbed by the entrance of wide-brimmed rivals. The pretty model at the top, of citron straw, has a binding of silver ribbon and trimming of white moire ribbon. Its companion, in white tulle and black catenon, has a white ribbon collar edged with silver beads and fastened with a silver buckle.
