Bird Dog Conditioning

As the hunting season approaches, both man and his bird dog need to get into condition.

Your dog's training should start six weeks before the hunting season opens since he may have grown soft over the summer and put on a little weight. You shouldn't starve off your dog's look of prosperity... you must work it off. A two-foot high platform in his kennel or pen for him to jump up on will provide some exercise for him each day.

An important part of his early conditioning is "roading." Put a leather harness on your dog with a long leash attached and let your dog pull against you at a walk on a street, trail or field for at least twenty minutes. Afterwards turn him loose to run for fifteen minutes. Gradually increase his running time until the dog is able to hunt for a full two hours without tiring. Then, he is physically able to hunt.

When your dog is conditioned for runs of an hour or more turn him loose in a field where he may find birds. Work him in the cover where he'll hunt during the season, and it will make him long winded as well as sharpen his hunting skills. And, if your state game laws permit, take a gun in the field and fire blanks. This will remind both him and you to be steady to shot and make both of you better hunters.

On Career Envoys

Washington, D. C.—A State Department report shows that seventy-six per cent of U. S. ambassadors are held by career diplomats. The President names all ambassadors through selection from Foreign Service ranks or political appointment.
