Participates In Workshop

Durham, N. C. - Walter N. McDonald, Director of Institutional Research at Louisburg College in Louisburg, N. C., was one of 16 educational development officers from junior and community colleges in North Carolina, South Carolina and Virginia who participated in an orientation workshop sponsored by the Regional Education Laboratory for the Carolinas and Virginia in Durham, January 9-11.

The purpose of the three-day meeting was to familiarize the educational development officers with the research tools and techniques that will enable them to study systematically the problems confronting their colleges in such areas as administration, student motivation and performance and the development of adequate remedial courses that will assist poorly prepared students to pursue college-level work. Such research studies will allow administrators to make policy decisions grounded not in supposition but in research-based facts.

The participating colleges are members of the junior and community college consortium set up by the laboratory last year not only to work toward better educational practices on their own campuses but to serve as models for constructive change in two-year colleges nationally.

The Regional Education Laboratory for the Carolinas and Virginia is one of a number of such private, non-profit organizations established under federal legislation to help improve the quality of education from kindergarten through graduate school. RELCV is the only laboratory with a major responsibility in higher education.

The junior and community college consortium includes: Central Piedmont Community College, Ferrum Junior College, Frederick Community College, Gaston College, John Tyler Community College, Marymount College of Virginia, Mitchell College, Mount Olive Junior College, Northern Virginia Community College, Southeastern Community College, Spartanburg County Technical Education Center, Wingate College; associate members in the consortium include: Davidson County Community, Kittrell College, Lenoir County Community College, and Louisburg College.
