choly nature if he sees things as serving the public, when, in fact, they appear to me. The haste to they are simply serving the corporof society, and in so tar as this desire involves a fair and square contest of individual genius and enerev it is not only legitimate, but highly commendable. Out of such things grow wealth and prosperity and all of which civilization is capuble. But when these riches are some bt to be obtained by wresting the taws to the service of one man or combination of men, by means of which another man or set of men is placed in the power of the first, who pilmder them at pleasure, this same taudable desire becomes, by its my bods and results, against society. It deprives one portion of the people of the equal protection of the laws; renders it less possible for them to maintain the struggle for their fair share of the public. prosperity, and converts a govern ment of freedom and equality into a despicable tyranny.
