This system we freely admit is revolutionary and contrary to our present financial system, which is both unjust and oppressive-unjust because the credit of the government is loaned to a class, and oppressive because that class obtain, through the necessitiess of the people, usurious rates of interest. And it is not an untried experiment. Germany and France have both used it. The former built up the empire saved the Republic in the last great trial by its use, and so admirably did it meet the exigencies of the situation that France adopted it as a permanent financial policy.
