A QUEER BIT OF CHARACTER FROM THE RECORDS OF A POLICE COURT.

If you were a sergeant at the desk of the Central Station you, too, would seem rim and hard-hearted to an outsider. y see so much crime—they see so nany phases of it-they hear the same excuses over and over until they seem to lose all faith in and all hope for those who sin. Their hearts grow hardened, the well-springs of mercy dry up, and you see no pity in their glances. And yet it needs but a sentiment to break through the crust.

The other night a woman was brought in staggering drunk. She had a face that was pinehed and drawn, and it was plain that worry and hunger made her look years older than she was. You and I would have looked into her face and said that she had some excuse for temporarily seeking to forget her identity The grim old Sergeant only saw an in fraction of the law, and he frowned upon her as she stood clutching the desk.

Here was a living book which recorded twenty years of worry, suffering, heartaches, poverty, woe and want, but he refused to turn the pages. He had no curiosity; he had no pity.

"Name!" he sharply demanded. She gave it.

"What have you got in that parcel?" "I'll never give it up!" she exclaimed | ing that way. It was something wrapped in an old there, but the Sergeant thought of poil always thought right, and spoken right handed up.
