BY FRANCES LOWE.

"Come, Wally, dear, make haste, or we shall be lete," called Lily Malcolm wrecking so many homes with his old one Sabbath morning as she stood waiting at the head of the stairs, holding her little Bible in her hand.

"I'm already, Lily; I'm coming right now," and a chubby-faced boy of five years came running from the bedroom, from her eyes and she saw and underputting a cap on his head as he spoke.

"Good bye, mamma," called both the children, as hand in hand they went that face, that only God's hand could down stairs and tapped on the door that remove. separated their home from the saloon which their father owned.

In response to their knock, John Malcolm looked through the glass side, and seeing who it was, came out.

"Well, chickens," he said good naturedly, "I suppose you've come to get some pennics for church," and putting his hand in his pocket, their father drew out some small change. "Now, that's for church, and this is for yourself," he continued, giving them each two bright undressed her, and then as in the olden nickels.

"Kiss me good bye, pets, and run off, business is brisk this morning, so I can't stay away, the more nickels I take in, the more you'll have for church."

"Don't you want to hear me say the golden text, papa, you always do, and don't you remember, at Christmas, you said if I knew it every Sunday, you would put ten cents in my missionary box," and Lily rubbed her soft cheek against her father's hand.

"Well, so I did, let me hear it," said John Malcolm, gazing with pride at the tiny figure before him.

"Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging, and whoseever is deceived thereby Lily remembered how one day, when she not wise," repeated Lily, reverently. "Quite true," murmured her father, to go to church, John Malcolm had only shaking his head, but fortunately Li'y, laughed. Perhaps, and Lily shuddered have this fine dress."

Somehow the words of that lerson worried Lify, and the low, tender ing what they could be doing at so early tones of Miss Allison as she dwelt on the an hour, he threw on his dressing gown evils of intemperance, seemed to echo and re-echo in her heart, and as she started homeward, she repeated the words of the text over and over.

She had almost reached home when she saw a miserably dressed girl standing at the corner of the street. Lily went over to her, and handing her one of her new nickels, said : "Here is something for you, Sally, and you ought to mend your dress. Why doesn't your mamma get you a new one, and send you to keeps a big saloon and sells drink to the Sunday school ?"

Like a stone, the girl's words fell on Lily's heart. She looked at her for a stood. All the light and gladness went

Lily almost flew home, and taking off the dainty silk dress that had given her so much pleasure in the morning, she hung it in the darkest corner of her closet. Her father could not understand why. When he came into dinner, she threw her arms around his neck kissing him again and again, and then burst into convulsive sobs. She would give no explanation, her grief was too deep for utterance, and fearing she was ill, they days, her father held her in his arms. A new and deeper love seemed to come into Lily's heart for him, and knowing that until she slept he would not leave her, she in her bed and had gone back to the saloon, Lily burst into tears again. Oh !

they could be true, her father cursed. "No. no. no," she screamed in agony; he was too good. In her trouble she did not know what to do; first, she thought of her mother; she would tell her and beg her to make her father stop; but Lily knew that would be of no use. Then Miss Allison came into her mind; but had come to try to persuade her parents day, he would let her bear the curse in-

As the two children passed their father's room, he saw them, and wonderand followed them. He wondered still more when they opened the door of the saloon, went behind the bar and fell on their knees. He crept softly to get as close to them as he could so that he could hear what they were going to say. "Now, Wally," said Lily, "we've got to pray awful hard; I'll begin, and when I say amen, it will be your turn." Folding her hands reverently, Lily began : "Dear Jesus, I'm Lily, and my papa men that makes them bad, so that they

One morning, as it was nearly a month from the day Lily out of her life, and a shadow fell upon had begun to pray, as the children knelt together, Wally said : "Isn't it most timo we finished, Lily ?"

All Lily answered was "Oh Wally" and lifting up her face, she poured out her anguish saying : "O Jesus ! we're getting awful tired, Wally and me, it doesn't seem as though you heard us pray, perhaps we're too little, and two of us isu't enough, but dear Jesus, we don't know who else to ask." Here Lily broke down completely, and the tears streamed down her face. This was more than John Malcolm could bear, he opened the door, and lifting the child to his arms, strained her to his heart saying : "Yes, Lily two are enough, Jesus has heard your prayer, and answered it too. From this day, the doors of John Malclosed her eyes. When he had laid her colm's saloon are closed forever. The same God who has answered the prayers of a little child, will hear those of her those awful words! Lily wondered if father."
