THE PRESCRIPTION.

"Dig Down Into It Like the Miner and Find Your Gold."

"Child, I know what's the matter with you." The old doctor's kindly eyes twinkled. "You have a malady that's very common these days."

"Then I'm in for typhoid fever—or something?" asked the woman wearily.

"Typhoid!" he exclaimed. "Just plain discontent, I call it. You're tired of life, and you show it. Why? You've got a home, husband, friends. Tragedy has never touched you. Yet if you go on, in six months' time you will be up for murder in the second degree!"

The woman sat up, and a red spot appeared on either cheek.

"I mean it," the doctor continued frankly. "The murder would be that of your real self, and the court would be higher than any held in this jurisdiction."

"Just what do you mean?" she asked.

"I mean that you have lived too hard, done too much of nothing that really mattered, and thought not at all."

"I know it's true," she admitted. "But what can I do?"

"Do you really want to know, or are you fishing for a little compromise that will be pleasantly exciting?"

She flushed. "I really want to know," she insisted. "It isn't as if I were alone."

The doctor nodded. "I know—your husband is in the same boat. Business cares and the high prices—it is a hard row to hoe these days."

"I am sick of it," said the woman. "Show me the way out, if you can."

"Away back in some out-of-way corner you have tucked an old book that was your mother's—the wisest book ever written. Study it! Put aside all other reading for a while. It won't hurt you," he said dryly, "and it holds the cure for discontent."

"The Bible!" she exclaimed. "I have read it—some."

"How do you suppose I'd have earned my living," the doctor asked, "if I'd read my books 'some'? You have got to work for anything that is worth while. Dig down into it like the miner and find your gold."

"But, doctor, tell me more. I know so little."

"There it is," he said quietly, "and you've got to get it for yourself. But I tell you I could never have cared for the sick—sick in body and mind—for forty years and kept sane unless I'd had something to tie to. That book has been my meat and drink. Get into it, and dig—for your life!"

As the door shut behind him the woman walked to the bookcase, reached behind a pile of books and held up a little worn volume. She turned the pages slowly, searching.

"Peace I give unto you," she said. "Not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled." She sank into the chair, still reading. Darkness came, and she reached gropingly for the light. Her face had lost its anxious look. The lines about her mouth softened as she came across passage after passage deeply underscored.

"This is where mother got her help," she said to herself softly.
