morning, the boiler at the mill of Trice Λ Vickers, on the Chapel Hill road four miles above town, bursted, killing the engineer, Trim Lewis, (col.) From what we could learn the engineer was under the innuence of whisky. He put on 110 lbs., by one of the hands, repled with an oath that the whole thing might blow up, he the explosion occurred. Trim Lewis was thrown some distance against a tree and was killed instantly. Most of the boiler was thrown probably one hundred yards. Several other persons were slightly injured. The damage to the engine is heavy.

[New York; Sun.] Buried Alive.

Several weeks laborers have been digging a sewer through West Thirty-fifth street. Yesterday morning they reached Fifth avenue. Two men, Wm. McGoldrick of 306 West Thirty-ninth street and Micheal Riley of Forty-third street and Eleventh avenue, were in advance, and were digging a broad hole about twenty yards from the avenue. After they had reached a depth of about fifteen feet and while they were still excavating, a crackling noise alarmed them. They dropped their shovels and started to run out of the trench, but were too late. With a great crash the sider of the ditch fell, and they were buried under three feet of gravel and paving stones. Their terrified companions threw down their tools and ran in a body to Fifth avenue. A crowd gathered about the sewer, but no one attempted to rescure Thirtieth street station arrived. The officers, under command of Capt. Williams, went quickly to work, and, with the aid of a carman from Fifth avenue, unearthed the men. As soon as the earth was from their heads, the buried men cried out, "For God's sake get us out. Don't stop." They were soon completely uncovered and lifted to the sidewalk. After a few minutes they recovered and walked home. The accident was due entirely to the carelessness of the men in not properly supporting the sides of the trench with braces.
