Ivy About Houses.

A writer on the subject of propogating ivy for the house says: 'When we see window furnished with the most beautiful of all screens, a living one of ivy, or a room in which the vine is made to run upon cornices or surround the picture frames, if we do not envy the possessor we feel a strong wish that we had some thing like it. Recollect that all this luxuriance had a beginning; this vine, the total length of which measures yards, was once but a few inches long. A small cutting, a little care, and time-these were all the outlay required for this treasure of verdure-and all these are within the reach of every one. Time, indeed, is the monument to the memory of the deceased, that a hunt would come off this morning chief element, but after a fair start has been made, less is required than one would suppose. Make a beginning; if with a rooted plant, all the better; if only a cutting or 'slip' can be had, start with that, for it will take root, with the greatest ease. When growing give it a fairly rich soil; water as needed, and-especially this-remove the dust from the leaves as often as it accumulates, by the use of sponge and warm water, and in time the reward will come.

The Last Fox Hunt.

At about 4 o'clock this morning the hearts of twenty-five young men of this city were caused to flutter by the sound of the hunter's horn, which warned them that they were to participate in their first fox hunt. It was suggested a short time since by some of the older hunters that some of the younger people should be induced to join them, and in accordance with the idea the young gentlemen alluded to and four or five young ladies were invited to join in the chase, which was cordially accepted. An old tame for was bought and fed for the purpose and notice was given through the city press (the 25th.) The fox was taken in buggy this morning to Hall's Neck, the hunters and dogs following, but the latter, although they scented the fox, ran wild as they could strike no trail. After the fox was turned loose, however, they soon got the trail and started in pursuit, when Reynard, being hard pushed, took to a tree. Finding that they could not dislodge him easily the party started on their return home, but had not proceeded far before the dogs struck another
