No item in the way of City Court today.

No interments in Bellevue Cemetery for the past week.

A judicious silence is better than truth spoken without charity.
There were two interments in Pine Forest Cemetery, both adults.
June rain storms, with very little addition, will become Fourth of July lemonade.

Sleeping cars are now run from Raleigh to Charlotte over the R. & A. L. and C. C. R. W.

It is rumored that Flavil W. Foster, Esq., is going to take charge and run a first class hotel at the Empire House.

The Register of Deeds issued during the past week nine marriage licenses, two of which were for white and seven for colored couples.

The quietest looking people in this world are a man accused of a crime of which he is innocent and a newly-married couple trying to pass for veterans.

Washington, D. C., June 14, 1879.

For the South Atlantic and East Gulf States Easterly to Southerly winds, stationary or slightly higher temperatures, clear or partly cloudy weather and in later District possibly occasional rains are probable with nearly stationary pressure, except followed by lower pressure in Northern portions of former.

New Inlet Closed
We understand that the final closing up of New Inlet was expected today. The force have been working on the last gap on the breakwater which extends from New Inlet to Smith's Island and it was hoped that the obstruction would be completed today. Mr. Henry Nutt went down the river this morning to be present on the occasion.

The Glen Alpine.
That prince of genial, good fellows and clever gentlemen, W. H. H. Gregory, Esq., is in the city in the interest of the Glen Alpine Springs, located near Morganton, in this State, and of which Mr. G. is Superintendent for the season. The climate of this resort is delightful and the country around is beautiful and picturesque. Mr. Gregory's name in connection with any Summer resort is a good guarantee of the quality of the place.

Still Behind.
And still the city and county tax lists are dilatory, only fourteen hundred having listed up this morning, which is probably about one-third or one-fourth of the entire taxpayers, and only nine more days allowed, in which time Mr. Cronly avers that it will be impossible to list all those who are yet to come. The result will be a big crowd in the last few days and a certainty that numerous taxpayers will have to be put on the delinquent list and consequently be required to pay double taxes.

Messrs Russell and Macks' Remarks.

We publish herewith the beautiful remarks made yesterday in the Court House by Hon. Dan'l. L. Russell and Mr. J. I. Macks, on the occasion of the meeting of the Bar, held in tender respect and regard to the memory of the late Col. Wm. S. Devane. The resolutions, and Judge Cantwell's remarks in presenting them, appeared in our yesterday's issue. It was a matter of great regret to us that we could not publish all then, but this was simply impossible, as the meeting was held at too late an hour for its accomplishment. We give the remarks in the order in which they were made. Mr. Macks said:

A variety of circumstances, Mr. Chairman, seems to render it peculiarly appropriate that I should avail myself of the present mournful occasion to pay a brief but just tribute to the memory of Col. W. S. Devane. Although the disparity of age was plainly discernible and visible, and although our professional intercourse was of short duration, still our departed friend and brother had endeared himself to me by his kind and gentle disposition, his noble and manly bearing, and above all by the willingness displayed on every occasion to render advice upon such questions as so often perplex the younger members of our profession. Seldom the occasion that he passed our office without coming in to chat a little. Grave and thoughtful at one moment, humorous and witty the next, it is not a wonder, then, Mr. Chairman, that one who possessed such traits could not fail to endear himself to those he came in contact with. It is unnecessary and at the same time impossible for me to detail to those who knew him longer and better the many virtues that Col. Wm. S. Devane possessed, and hence I shall not on this occasion detain you with a repetition of his life as written on the pages of history, but shall content myself by testifying my heartfelt and sincere grief at the loss of one who not alone deemed it a pleasure, but a duty, to assist his younger friends of the profession whenever and wherever called upon. I wreath this garland around the memory of our friend, regretting my inability to do better. He has been called to eternal rest, his presence is sadly missed; may we not hope that he is transported from this earthly sphere to heavenly bliss? My younger brethren of the profession let me on this occasion appeal to you to emulate the virtues of our departed friend so that we will, when it shall please our Heavenly Father to remove us from this world, become as truly missed and our memories revered and honored. I respectfully second the resolutions of the Committee.

Judge Russell spoke after the reopening of the Court. His remarks were as follows:

I do not feel that I ought to omit this opportunity to give expression to my regard and esteem for him whose loss we now deplore. For more than ten years, amid all the struggles of the most exciting period in the civil history of North Carolina—a period of destruction and reconstruction, of revolution and reaction, of fundamental changes in government and convulsions in society so universal that there was no man or woman but felt them in their very heartstrings; a period during a part of which, as has been the case in all countries amid sudden changes in the cherished habits and institutions of a people, the passions of men were aroused and were as intense as if organized war existed; a period of achievements of follies, of surprises of exigencies, when men were hurried and cast about by the storms of constantly recurring events which they could not control; when their minds were as cloudy as the political horizon around them; when all was being changing and none consistent; when the tired of day might be the enemy of to-morrow—amid all these strifes and contentions, we maintained a friendship unimpaired and unbroken. Firm and decided in his opinions on all subjects, he never was the man to attempt to force them on others by exhibitions of intolerance or bigotry. He knew that it was not consistent with our happiness and welfare that people should be restrained of the largest liberty of thinking and acting for themselves, nor that they should receive their opinions from select teachers. Imbued with this spirit of liberality, he could differ without hating.

When I came to the Bar in 1866, Col. Devane was one of the most accurate and best read lawyers in this circuit. Four years of terrible service in the field had not consumed the very considerable legal acquirements of which he had been the master in 1861. "The wise saws and ancient precedents" of the law came back to him naturally when he returned to the profession after the war. But then the wounds and injuries and diseases which his physical system had received in the camp and on the field had scarcely begun their fatal work. Suffering greatly from these causes, as the body yielded to pain the mind in a measure gave way. He served his State with exceptional fidelity, and really gave his blood and his life in its service. His life and his death were not less admirable than they would have been had he fallen on the field of battle, amid the shouts of his victorious soldiers, and leading an army with banners.

whose opinion of the nature of men is not to be despised—not because he was an Emperor, for Kings and Emperors are generally made of the smallest and meanest of mankind, but because he was a great master of human nature—said that the man who never knew fear never was born. Of all men whom I have ever known William S. Devane came as near as any to the ideal hero whose existence was disputed by the great Spauldard. He had a courage, moral and physical, which never blanched in the presence of danger, and never struck under disaster. He could face danger and death with a calmness and intrepidity such as is given to few mortals. Of such "sterner stuff" heroes and martyrs are made, the men who rule the human race from the rack, the stake and the scaffold.

And yet he was warm-hearted, generous, tender, genial, affectionate, never forgetting a favor, and preferring to give rather than to receive them. When stricken by the grim hand of death, he was surrounded by his family with two of his little children on his knee. Truly
"The bravest are the tenderest;
The loving are the daring."

Such a character shines with that sweet and beautiful radiance which distinguishes the planet of the evening in the Western sky.

Col. McRae at Davidson.
Hon. Duncan K. McRae, of this city, delivered the address at Davidson Commencement on Wednesday. The Charlotte Observer publishes a full report of the proceedings of the day and we extract that portion relative to the address. It says:

Dr. Hepburn then introduced the orator of the occasion, Hon. Duncan K. McRae, of Wilmington. The speaker appeared as a man of about fifty years, rather slender, with iron-gray side-whiskers and mustache, and bright, piercing gray eyes. His subject was the relation of genius and talent. For an hour and a half he held his audience spell-bound. I am aware that reporters of newspapers have said the same thing of many speakers; they are expected to say it often when it is not altogether true; but in using this form of expression as applied to Col. McRae, it is used advisedly. His manner is just enough dramatic to merit the closest attention; his style is elevated and abounds in attractive sentences of wit and wisdom; now a graphic description of the genius of Homer, a brilliant comparative picture of Scipio Africanus, a touch which seems to bring Shakespeare and Dante to life, a happy analogy of the characters of England's four greatest statesmen, of Webster, Clay, Calhoun, Lee and Grant; then a bright sally of wit, a happy hit upon the pretentious wisdom, the toilies of the day, and a beautiful figure of speech. None could keep from listening; all were sorry when he stopped.

The applause throughout was hearty and whole-souled. The clapping of hands which followed the close of the address was renewed when Judge Fowle walked across the rostrum and congratulated the speaker.

That the readers of the Observer may not think that your correspondent has spoken with too much enthusiasm of Col. McRae's effort, he will quote a remark of Judge Schenck, who said that it was the most brilliant literary address he ever heard. This opinion is concurred in by many other persons equally capable of judging its merits. North Carolinians are proud of their distinguished son.

I hope to be able to furnish the Observer with some extracts from this brilliant address.

At the close of Col. McRae's speech, the audience called on Judge Fowle, who responded by saying that like one who had been asked his opinion on some military matter, he would reply that he could not speak of war in the presence of Hannibal—pointing towards Col. McRae. This gentleman quickly responded that it was hardly fair to compare him to Hannibal, whom he had just described as ugly and ungainly.

Another Exodus.
Messrs. W. Hanstein and Adolph Bear will leave this city on Wednesday next for a trip to the old country. Our young friends propose visiting most of the places of interest across the waters during their trip and will return about the first of October. They are going on a visit of business and pleasure combined, i. e. they will make it their business and pleasure to bring back a "piece of calico." We wish them a pleasant trip and safe return.

The National Bell Telephone.

SEE THE REPORT OF THE RICHMOND STATE NEWSPAPER.

We may seem to refer rather frequently to the telephone but it is because we are impressed both with the wonderful character of the discovery and its wide range of useful and beneficial employment.

Prof. Alex. Graham Bell is yet scarcely more than a boy—under thirty years old, we believe,—yet he has reason to be thankful that, whatever else he may do worth noting, he has already achieved a high place among the world's benefactors.

Many examples might be given of valuable time saved in emergencies—physicians promptly summoned and the like—which demonstrate the advantages to Society developed at this comparatively early stage in the history of the telephone.

Perhaps one of the most pleasant instances of the beneficent results of this invention occurred on Sunday last in connection with Rev. Dr. Hoge's church, in this city. A member of his family has for several years been confined to her room as the result of an accident. She has thus been for these years deprived of the privilege, which too many of us with full use of our limbs value lightly enough, of attending church.

Last week a Blake Transmitter was placed upon one of the pillars of the pulpit, almost entirely hidden from sight by a book placed against it, so that its presence was perceived by very few of the congregation. A small insulated wire ran down inside the pulpit rail and across the angle of a stair, up the wainscoting and along under the top rail out through a gimlet-hole in the window frame, and to the top of the parsonage, passing down through the ventilator into the chamber of the invalid young lady, where it was attached to the ordinary Bell hand-telephone. Imperceptibly to all around the little instrument did its work, conveying to the ear of the patient sufferer the sounds of the well-known voice in the pulpit for the first time in long years.

Of course the reverend doctor was anxious during the morning sermon, as his thought reverted to the distant listener, to know if she heard, and his pleasure may be imagined when he learned that the entire service, sermon, prayers, hymns organ and singing had been plainly audible to the person for whose comfort the arrangement had been planned. And in the afternoon sermon, in referring to mysterious things in nature, he said: "This little telephone carries my voice over an invisible wire to the room of one who has not been permitted to enter the house of God for years, and she hears every word I say as distinctly as you do." After the service several friends of the lady conversed with her from the pulpit and were informed that she had heard the lowest tones of the preacher's voice and the lowest notes of the organ at the other end of the church, and distinguished the different "parts" in the music of the choir.
