STRAWS!

In every presidential campaign of always been a greater or less number blowing. While many of these socalled straws have been trivial and inupon the result was concerned, there have always been others which very plainly indicated to a close observer of the political horizon, with almost unerring certainty, in whose favor the campaign would terminate. This was notably the case in the campaigns of 1840, 1844, 1848 and 1860. After the last mentioned campaign there was no particular indication of popular sentiment until 1876, when there was a revolution in political feeling and Tilden was elected by a large majority of the popular vote and by a clear majority in the electoral college, although he was cheated out of the position by the blackest and most damnable fraud people. Since then popular sentiment has been working in favor of the great Democratic party of the ccuntry, although not very notably until the presentyear. There is not a doubt that Hancock would have been elected by a good majority in the electoral college in 1880, had it not been for the perfidy of John Kelly, who used his influence Freckles and Pimples. against the party just on the eve of election, thus securing its deteat.

In the present year, however, there bave been any quantity of these political straws to show, as plainly as signs can tell, that in the nomination of Blaine, the Republicans, have signed heir own death-warrant; and that in respect—when she gets mad she won't the nomination of Cleveland, the Dem- play. octats have been assured of victory. In the nomination of Cleveland, by the Democrats, these disgusted Republicans saw and seized the golden opportunity by which they might show record was unstained, and at the same time show their contempt for a party with reprehensible acts.

The speeches were plain, practical and business like, and were the Republican party, were to a man opposed to the election of Blaine, and were equally as unanimous in their determination to use their influence and cast their votes for Cleveland. That convention represented, probably as much sterling worth as was ever assembled for political purposes in New York, and was a straw -yes, a mammoth load of straws-portentous of a complete Democratic triumph.
