Lewis was a native ter and a pharmacist of excellent reputation. He was a brother to Messrs. R. J. and George Lewis, both now of this city. He learned the business with Mr. W. H. Lippitt, who was at that time the leading druggist in the town and whose establishment was located just where Col. Hedrick is now, Northeast cor ner Market and Front streets. Mr. Lewis had scarcely arrived at man's estate when the war broke out. He enlisted in the Wilmington Rifle Guards, Co. I, 18th N. C. Regiment, and was afterwards, because of his knowledge of medicine, detailed for duty in the office of the Medical Purveyor of North Carolina, Dr. T. In 1862 the yellow fever was Second street, near Walnut, where brought here on the steamer Kate, a blockade runner, which broke cargo at Smithville. The yellow fever ap peared on her. The news was at first confined to the officials and to medical circles. Mr. Lewis heard of it and told us. He informed us that he believed the fever would become epidemic here; that if it did he knew that the drug clerks would desert their posts and that the need of > that he would himself become a victim to it. His inclination, he told us, prompted him to fly the city but his duty called upon him to stay, as he knew that his services would be of great value in the emergency. It was all just as he said. The fever appeared here, it became epidemic, the drug clerks fled, and Mr. Lippitt called upon Dr. Boykin for Mr. Lewis' assistance. That gentleman was detailed for duty there and he remained faithfully at work day and night, until he too fell a victim. He died at his post, and with his harness on, and as gallantly as did ever a soldier on the field of battle. It was on a Friday or Saturday, we have never been able to recollect which, that while on horseback, en route for the Sound, we rade up on the pavement in front of Mr. Lippitt's store and called Mr. Lewis to the door. We conversed there pleasantly for some each other the good-bye, we rode off. But it was not good-bye; it was farewell, a long farewell. It was the last time we ever saw him and
