How Haskell Lost His Arm.

Col. Haskell has but one arm. He lost the other at the battle of Gaines' Mill on June 27, 1862. How it was lost may interest our readers. Gen Lee had crossed the Chickahominy and was advancing on McClellan. The battle of Mechanicsville had been fought on the 26th. Jackson was coming on the field, having made connection with Lee's forces. Haskell was serving on the staff of Gen. D. R. Jones, but being indisposed, remained at headquarters for some time after Gen Jones had gone towards the river to observe the enemy. This did not suit him, and although scarcely in condition for any exertion at all, he mounted The most APPETIZING and WHOLESOME his horse and rode forward. He found Gen Jones and Gen Magruder on high ground on the south side of the 'Chickahominy. Beyond the C. E. HIRES. PHILADELPHIA. river in plain view the enemy 'were hurrying forward in dense columns to overwhelm our forces. From recent heavy rains the river was out of its banks. There was no bridge to cross but it was necessary to convey information as to the enemy to Gen Lee. Col Haskell rode a remarkably fine horse, once the property of Gen Turner Ashby, and he undertook to deliver the message. He quickly made his way to the river and soon the noble horse and its gallant rider were beating the rushing waters. A line of the enemy's cayalry pickets caught sight of the daring rider and opened fire upon him and continued to do so until he reached the north side of the river and disappeared in a body of timber. The message was delivered and Col Haskell remained with Longstreet until late in the evening he was directed by Longstreet to order R. H. Anderson's brigade forward. He did so, and, going to the front, he found many .$4 00 men scattered and broken. He collected about two hundred of these, and forming on the right of Whit-HARPER'S WEEKLY...... 4 00 ing's division, with a stand of colors in his hand, advanced with them to within about fifty yards of the enemy's breastworks. He pulled his horse up and spurred him, and the animal carried him and the flag right in among the enemy and fell dead, catching Col Haskell's foot under him. For some time it was impossible for Col Haskell to free himself. As he fell a Yankee Captain dashed at him and attempted to take the stand of colors from Haskell's left hand, but Haskell had a sword swung to his right wrist by a sword knet and grasping it he struck at the Yankee, who by this time had drawn his pistol and fired, striking the star from the collar of Haskell's to his knees, and as he turned with the pistol still in his hand Haskell ran his sword through him, killing him almost instantly.

Haskell then went to the left and came again to the men he had colleeted and found them in front of the twenty four gun battery which was sweeping the plateau in their front. They rallied to a man around the fiag which he still held in his hand and he led them forward with hand and he led them forward with Hood's brigade as it made its second charge. At the very cannon's mouth his arm was torn into shreds and he fell still grasping the colors. There he lay until night had closed the conflict, when Gen Whiting passing by, recognized him and had King's New Discovery for Consump him conveyed to the field hospital, tion, am now on my third bettle, and where the wound was temporarily bandaged and he was sent to Richmond.
