District Attorney John B. Fellows will, it is thought, be able to gratify his long cherished desire of entering Congress at the coming election. It is proposed to have the Colonel entered for one of the New York districts in which there will be a certainty of his election. To go to Washington, as a member of the House of Representatives, is far more to the liking of the Colonel than retention of any county office. The press has not altogether approved the course of Col. Fellows while district attorney, and now that his term is about to expire he seeks, without regret, public service in another field. The Colonel is one of the most eloquent orators of the city's eminent host, and Congress tation on his entry into the National Legislature.

The idea that the proximity of industrial towns created by a high tariff will bring continued growth and prosperity to farmers, truckraisers and the like receives a refutation in the results of the last cen sus in Connecticut. There, if any where, the wonderful "home market" should shower its promised good condision. It given to a bird during blessings on the agriculturist. But somehow it doesn't. The twelve cities of Connecticut had about them in 1880 farm towns with an aggregate population of 48,315. In 1890 the population of these farm towns has declined to 43,567, a decline of about 10 per cent. The situation is an ideal one in Connecticut for farmers, if there is anything in the "home market" cry. The farming districts there ought to multiply! But they do not. The fact is that where railroads are abundant the market created by a manufacturing industry is worth next to nothing. The price of produce is determined by the areas that grow it most cheaply. The home market price is not better than the general price. The local products must take what they can get in competition with Nebraska wheat raisers, Georgia truck-raisers and Carolina watermelon-growers,

The Washington correspondent of the New York Sun says that Senator Hiscock's support of the Quay resolution, providing for the postponement of the Force bill, recalls a story which is being told there and is said to be based on solid facts. A few evenings ago Speaker Reed, Gen. Clarkson, and one or two more wellknown Republicans were at the White House consulting with the President about the Congressional Campaign Committee. Senator Hiscock came along accidentally, and the President left his visitors for half an hour while he held an earnest conversation with the Senator. The President made known to Mr. Hiscock his earnest desire that the election bill should be passed, and urged him to aid its speedy consideration. The Senator, so the report goes, assured the President that his anxiety for the passage of the bill was no less than his own, and expressed his willingness and eagerness to support it heartily. A day or two after this Tom Platt skipped into Washington. He stepped out again in a few hours, but in the meantime had a long that with Senator His cock, in which he acquainted him with the fact that he was as anxious for the defeat of the election bill as the President possibly could be for its passage. Mr. Platt reminded Mr. Hiscock of his large property interests and investments in the South. and besought him to leave no stone unturned to have the elections bill work their territory "for all it is worth," are indefinitely postponed.
