CHAPTER L

"Who is it?"

"A spr—one of the vigilantes. Down him, or the game is best?"

These calculations, spoken rapidly and excitedly, broke the silence of a wird and tragic seens in one of the lovellest valleys of the far West.

They were directed toward a man who had suddenly appeared upon a land-scape which for over an hour had held half a dozen human figures, who had been lurking in the vicinity of a lonely stretch of railroad.

The time was night, relieved by the stretch of radicoad.

The time was night, reflexed by the refulence of a September moon, its rays just beginning to Humine mountain and valley with a rare crystalline healts.

Half a mile d stant, where the river stretched a dim silver thread of radi-ance, a locally station showed, from which glimmered the light of a single laster. At the spot where the story opens, the single ratiway track curved over a high trestic work and then descended on a sharp grade toward the station and the horyears this section, especially the

For years this section, especially the course pursues by the railroad, which was a resently constructed branch of the great Pacine system, had been known as the Food caryon trail. The station was called The spat and the nearest settlement was recently miles over the mountain at Miner's suilch.

Reyond that stretched an alternation of plain and hid and valley, infested even at the time of our narrative by marrantian bands of savages.

The region was one in which a rough, moralized set of miners and rainers resided, and outlaw bands found it a favorite held for the roperations.

As has been stated, one heart previous to the arrange of the words that begin the some, dismounted silently, led their horses to a thicket near by and their begins massed together near the railroan.

Here for some moments they were engaged in some mysterious in general about the radis 1 to of their number, went down the tracks to the station, returned, mintered an eminon. "All right," and then their disky figures moved by my more hidred.
