STALLIONS FIGHT DUEL TO DEATH

Men on Steamship Look On as Big Black Animal Kills His Bay Rival.

BATTLE LASTS HOURS

Lives of Other Horses Threatened as Well as Lives of Members of Crew
Who Attempted to Separate Mad Animals.

New York.—Officers and men of the steamship Margold, which reached Newark recently from Buenos Aires with its decks crowded with horses, were still talking of a battle fought at sea when two days out, between two huge stallions and which ended in the death of one worth several thousand dollars.

Through some carelessness in stowing the live cargo the two foes, a black and a bay, were placed in adjoining inclosures.

Their natural wildness through a life on the broad pampas of Argentina was increased by the excitement of strange surroundings and throughout the first day of their incarceration in the dark hold of the ship shrill neighing followed by the drumming of hoofs on the stanchions and bulkheads sounded continuously.

Equine Rivals Meet.

At last, driven to a frenzy by the rolling of the ship, the black snapped the head chain, and plunging backward, crashed through the wooden bar behind him. His first act on gaining his freedom was to sink his teeth into the flesh of the bay in the next stall, and maddened by pain the latter also broke loose.

Then a battle between the two commenced, which lasted for hours and threatened the lives of the other horses as the two plunged, now and then rearing to strike out with their front hoofs and again wheeling to lash out with their heels. At length they reached a clear space underneath an open hatch around the edge of which the crew clustered to watch the final round.

Black Lands Knockout.

After circling cautiously about each other for a time, warily watching for an opening like two boxers, the black suddenly reared and crashed down with both hoofs on the head of his adversary. The other stood dazed for an instant by the impact, and in that moment the black seized his advantage and fastened his teeth in the back of the bay's neck, the death grip sought by wild horses as instinctively as the bulldog goes for the throat of his rival.

Despite the frantic efforts of the crew to separate the pair the black bore steadily down until the bay's head was pressed against the deck. Then came a sudden twist of the black's head, a sharp crack was heard, and the bay lay with a broken neck. His blood lusted satisfied, the black was contented and was led quietly back to his stall.
