SIDE DRESSING COTTON

A High School boy, Elstner Beall, of Wilson, Arkansas, has won the State Cotton Growing Championship for the past two years. In 1924 with 200 pounds of Nitrate of Soda per acre at planting and 100 pounds when the cotton was knee high, he averaged 752 pounds of lint cotton per acre. Last year with 300 pounds of Soda at planting and a side dressing of 100 pounds, he averaged 1,008 pounds of lint cotton per acre.

Side dressings of 100 pounds of Soda per acre played an important part in his prize winning achievements.

Will Terry, of Jackson, won the Hill section of the Mississippi Cotton Production Contest. In addition to his other fertilizers, he used 200 pounds of Nitrate of Soda as a top dressing.

The results of Experiment Station tests and the experience of successful planters alike have proven that it pays handsomely under average conditions to apply 200 pounds of Soda per acre under cotton and another 100 pounds as a side dressing before the first squares appear. The reason for this is that the squares are set early and fast before either dry weather or the weevil can hurt the crop very much, and a large yield of lint is produced.

The side dressing is even more important, however, in a late season such as we have had this year. It is imperative if the crop is to be fully profitable, that there be plenty of available nitrogen in the soil when the crop really begins to grow, particularly if not enough Soda was put under the cotton at planting time.

That the nitrogen in Nitrate of Soda is much more quickly available and therefore much more efficient than when applied in any of the other materials that are being offered is fully proven by more than 20 years of continuous investigations at the New Jersey Experiment Station, and also by tests made in European countries which agree with and confirm those of New Jersey. This fact is of especial interest in a season like the present one when it is of such great importance that the cotton crop should be pushed ahead rapidly in order to make up for its delayed start.

It should be remembered that profits from the crop are much more dependent upon high acre yields when cotton prices are relatively low than when they are high. Thus, a side dressing of quickly available nitrogen at just the time when the young cotton plants need it most should be a splendid investment this year.
